Profiles, Prices, and Projections

Dear Reader,

Thank you for joining me on the maiden journey of Rotoman's Fantasy Baseball Guide 2024.

Whether you're reading the PDF version on a screen or holding the print-on-demand version in your hands, I hope you find the provocative opinions, good humor, and solid information that I've attempted to provide each baseball preseason since 1996.

I started out as a fantasy baseball writer at ESPN that year, but I became a magazine editor when a publisher named Barry Rosenbloom asked me to start a magazine in 2000. From the beginning I suspected his motive was more about winning his league than extracting profits, and he gave me a free hand in shaping the Guide as long as his team did well.

Steve Moyer, who was working for Rotowire at the time, came on board in 2001 and was most influential in imagining a bigger magazine than I could back then. The idea for Picks and Pans was mine, but it was Steve who suggested we open them up to the industry. Steve's untimely death still haunts me, as his plain words of praise about each year's issue were often followed by a list of the things I screwed up. No detail was too tiny to mention. He is missed.

Another friend whose passing came too soon, Lawr Michaels,, organized each year's mock draft for The Guide. Lawr, too, was a people person, and his ecstatic gravity pulled so much talent and fun into my orbit, I will always be grateful.

This Guide has no Picks and Pans and no Mock Draft, though I hope to have one in February published in the newsletter (rotoman.substack.com) to honor the opening of Spring Training camps, but i hope you find the profiles provocative and fun, the bid prices challenging, and the projections perfect.

Please let me know what works for you and, more importantly, what doesn't work. My email is askrotoman@gmail.com. Your feedback helps me focus on what matters most to you, the reader. It has been a much different business putting the whole thing together myself, and the work is really just getting started. Thanks for coming along on the ride.

Sincerely,

HITTERS A-Z Legend

Age equals 2024 minus the year of the player's birth.
Games Played are for the major leagues (ML). Many minor leaguers have their primary position marked. Many do not. Baseball-Reference.com is the best place to check minor league games played data. The minor league level displayed is the level the batter had the most at bats that year.

2024 Bid Price is Rotoman's best guess at a bid price come March. It is supposed to serve as a guideline to Rotoman's thinking as of Christmas 2023.

He was strictly platooned in his time for Boston last summer and he hit for average, but that isn't his scouting report or his underlying numbers. Look for a modest BA and hope that his power and speed converts to homers and steals. A lot will depend on whether he regularly platoons against righties or ends up in a more fifth outfielder role (or back in the minors), but he is strong and fast enough to be helpful if he's cheap enough or if he plays enough.

He landed with the Mets in the Max Scherzer deal, and the brother of NL MVP Ronald Acuna brings similar exciting skills to the game. He swings hard and runs fast and while he hasn't shown his brother's power he has shown the speed, stealing 57 bases last year while being caught 10 times. It's hard to critique his aggressive swing when he walks nearly 10 percent of the time, and the youngster is likely to grow into a more consistent approach.

He'll hone his tools in Triple-A this year and if things click he is likely to see the majors upon any sign that he's ready. METS

He was off to a fine start when a teammate's batted ball whacked him in the head and caused a concussion. He slumped at first upon his return but was mostly back to his old self by September. Consider last year a blip, he should be fine.

The steals and stolen bases last year stand out, but it was the PCL of course. His MLE last year was 10 homers, 27 steals, with a .217 batting average. He's blocked right now by some other not complete players, so while he's likely to hurt your batting average he might be a nice addition as a fifth outfielder at some point.

Had about the same number of plate appearances last year as he did in 2022, hit about the same number of homers, but had a batting average .097 points higher. Don't get excited, much of that was BABIP luck. His xBA was .222. His season ended with hand surgery in mid-September, but he's expected to be ready by the start of Spring Training.

It just takes some guys longer to figure out how to do it in the majors. Last year Adell figured out how to do it in Triple-A, kind of, but his MLB strikeout rate jumped to more than 40 percent. In a small sample. The sample is going to stay small unless he figure out how to read major league pitches better. He looks lost up at the plate, flummoxed by most all pitches, though the stats show he did okay versus curves. The Angels or somebody is going to give him another chance or two or three, the power potential is all too real, but keep his price low. The bust potential is huge.

In his injured years he's hit the ball more softly than in his full seasons. Last year he walked more and struck out less, a sign of improvement in his approach. He did not partake in the steals extravaganza that was going on, limiting his upside. He's gotten slower, so that's not a fluke.

The collapse in his batting average was due to a wicked increase in strikeouts and a collapsing BABIP. The batted ball data shows that 1) he had 30 fewer plate appearances (roughly), 2) 30 fewer line drives, 3) 25 more strikeouts, 4) 20 fewer ground balls. Statcast shows he was hitting the ball pretty similarly to 2022 when he was hitting it, so write off the 30 strikeouts, but his batting average should be closer to the .244 xBA Statcast shows. Of course, if the strikeout rate bump isn't fixable or gets worse, that's a different problem.

Struggled in the first half, which started for him in May after a thumb injury, while an oblique issue troubled him for much of June before he landed on the IL in July. His second half was golden, however, and he brought his flair for the dramatic to the playoffs yet again. His Sprint Speed dropped precipitously last year to the 37th percentile, at least in part because of the injuries, but he was only caught twice stealing 14 bases in two-thirds a season's worth of at bats. With a new manager and another year older how much he runs this year is very much up in the air.

Has the defensive chops to hold down the lead catcher role in the majors at age 21. Only five major league catchers had a season with 400+ at bats at younger ages: Johnny Bench, Ray Schalk, Joe Torre, Butch Wynegar, and Al Lopez. Alvarez demonstrated last year that he also has the power to contribute for fantasy, but his batting average was a problem. The good news is that his contact skills suggest a batting average of .250 is closer to his true talent, though because he's no Esteury Ruiz maybe he'll fall a little short of that. Or maybe he'll get better with more experience, and he's no Ernie Lombardo either. Expect some ups and downs this year, but his overall trajectory is up.

He's only seen 41 Double-A at bats so far, so he's unlikely to see the big leagues this year, but he's shown such bat control and strike-zone judgment that he's expected to be a high average hitter in the majors with some pop and speed, plus bases on balls. He did strike out more than he walked in that short Double-A stint, the first time that has happened as a pro. ROCKIES

The telling signs for Anderson are that he's hitting more grounders, many more grounders, while his sprint speed has dropped from top quartile to below average. His defense and arm strength have similarly fallen off, a worrying sign for a veteran middle infielder. Might he reverse things? How bad was he last year? His batting WAR (Fangraphs) was worse than Tim Anderson's. He says he's staying in Florida in the offseason to regain the strength and athleticism that made him a feared power-hitter in younger days and to work on his confidence. He's not planning to work on his free-swinging approach, because that's what he is. I'm skeptical that's going to do it. One of the processes as you get older, as a player, is you have to adjust your mental game in order to maximize your declining physical capabilities. If he doesn't do that it is only going to matter a little how strong and athletic he is. Expect a bounceback, but not to the level of his youthful glory days.

An early season IL visit because of a bad back was followed by another trip to the IL with a groin strain in May. He then spent time in Triple-A until he was called up briefly in September. The results at both levels were not encouraging. His contact issues were supposed to be offset by his power, but that has been lacking, too. Maybe he will regain it with better health but for now he's looking like a Triple-A catcher needing an injury to get another shot at a job.

His not secret weapons are making contact and running, but they didn't work for him after his callup last August. He should get another shot at the weak side of the platoon this spring on a team that tends to maximize its players' contributions or moves on. RAYS

The Mets promoted him pretty aggressively, after only 147 Triple-A plate appearances, and he struggled a bit. He swung and missed a lot more and lost control of the strike zone, something he was very good at at lower levels. Can he make the adjustments necessary? He hit the ball hard, so it's possible, but to get at his power he's going to have to hit fewer grounders. I would expect better pitch recognition this year and more power and some more walks, and a decided step up.

Put up the lowest hard hit percentage of his career, but last season looks enough like his MVP 2019 line that it will be tempting to say "he's back" and expect more of the same. He was definitely hurting in recent years recovering from shoulder surgery, but the Statcast numbers last year say he's either still not back power-wise or he's turned into a different player. Don't expect a bust, but don't expect a repeat either. Do expect some major league team will overpay for him this winter, though the fact that it's mid-January and he's not been signed suggest maybe they won't.

It's hard to fathom why the White Sox signed him for five years, but before they did he did get on base at a good clip. That, however, was mostly because of good BABIP luck. This year his luck was more or less normal and he got on a lot less. He makes contact but doesn't lift the ball or put a charge into it, hence five homers in 600+ plate appearances.

Expectations were high that he'd run wild with the new rules, but that didn't happen even though Sprint Speed says he was just as quick as in 2022. Maybe hitting at the bottom of the order, rather than the top, was the difference. He's unlikely to hit .294 again and speedsters lose something as they proceed through their 30s, so temperance is suggested.

Moves on from being the lead catcher on the Rays to being the backup catcher on the opposite coast in Miami. When he was coming up in the Braves organization there was talk about him becoming a two-way player, and when he landed in San Diego a few years later he was listed as both a catcher and a pitcher. My joke then was that he didn't really hit enough to be a two-way player, but in two years he only pitched 5.3 innings in six games, allowing six earned runs. The last two years, in comparison, he's pitched 7 innings and allowed five runs. His main fantasy value as a catcher has been hitting some homers, and while Miami is a tough place to homer, so was Tampa. Ultimately his change of role limits his potential value.

In the preseason he said he planned to run more, but he didn't even before he had knee and oblique issues in August and September. Maybe he didn't run because he's slower. When he was swiping bases he was in the Top Quarter in Sprint Speed, but two years ago he fell to the 53rd percentile, and last year he fell into the lower half (49th percentile). He's still a terrific player but with limited steals he's not the fantasy icon he once was.

He walked more than he struck out last year in Triple-A, but not in Double-A. Concerns about his glove and power should keep his price low, but a base-stealing third baseman with a little pop would be a nice late add in NL Only leagues. The playing time and contact risks make him a bit of a lottery ticket in deeper mixed leagues. BREWERS

Not a prospect but a genuine stolen base threat last year. If he hangs onto a weak-side platoon role he won't be worth much, but he'll definitely steal some bases.

He's got nearly a full season of appearances in over the last two years and has a career OPS of .631. He did improve last year so a late-bloomer flowering isn't out of the question, and he walks enough that his power might play, but as a corner outfielder with limited range a lot of things have to break right for him to play everyday. His .726 OPS versus righties last year is his likely path to playing time for a team with little chance of climbing out of the basement, much less being in the playoff hunt.

Fantasy owners had to like the bump in steals last year. The decrease in RBIs is striking, especially because he mostly batted fourth and fifth. In 2022 he mostly batted third and fourth. He didn't hit well last year with runners on base, which is more likely a blip than a true thing.

All the homers he hit in 2018 and 2019 changed our expectations, but he has settled in as a patient contact hitter with some but not a lot of pop. Think 50+ extra base hits, not 70+. For what it's worth this is his contract year.

Did the Guardians trade Will Benson because they were getting confused between two 25 year olds named Will whose two-syllable last name started with B? If so they kept the weaker of the two. Brennan makes good contact but has little power and better than average but not great speed. Expect a decent BA and some steals, and maybe not too many at bats against lefties.

Missed time in April, May, and September with a bad oblique, and sat a fair amount against lefties. Which was smart, because he had just a .461 OPS against them last year. He wasn't quite as inept in 2022, but his .548 OPS then was still terrible. Expect more platooning, some power, and worry about injuries as he gets older.

When healthy, or at least mostly healthy, he's still productive, but as the injuries accumulate he seems to be increasingly risky. He's become much more focused when healthy on hitting line drives, fewer big flies, and much more contact. Is this the year his price breaks?

Let's start with the negative. Last year he struck out 27.6 percent of his plate appearances and was out on pop ups in the infield 15.7 percent of the time. That means that he was pretty much an automatic out in more than 43 percent of his times up. When he touched the ball and didn't pop up, however, he hit the ball hard, with an average exit velocity of 91.9 mph. His hardest hit ball was 118.2 mph, which was fourth best behind guys named Acuna, Olson, and Ohtani. His xBA was .268 last year and if he can keep that up, or match the .250 hitter he was for real, he has real value, but his 67-percent contact rate suggests he's more of a .225 hitter. The homers are nice, but a squintingly low BA is a real possibility.

If he's going to make it with the Cubs, his new home, he's going to have to hit. He has no defensive value, he'll play first base in Chicago, and he struggled with the bat in the majors last year. The Dodgers, who surely know better than me, played him at third, second, and first base during his short stints as a an injury replacement last summer, so there is that. There is also the difficulty of translating Pacific Coast League stats because of the small ballparks at altitude in dry air. His PCL numbers last summer translate to those of a big league regular, perhaps, but the explosion of his strikeout rate in the majors is cautionary. In earlier minor league stints he'd struggled with contact despite excellent strike zone judgment, which means he might be able to adjust further after more exposure, but he also might have reached his limit. While it was hard to find him regular plate appearances with the stacked Dodgers, he should be given a shot at regular playing time with Chicago. I'd say he has Max Muncy-type upside but is two steps short of proving it. (Note that Muncy didn't prove himself in the majors until he was 27 years old.)

He was solid in Double- and Triple-A last year, but struggled when he reached the majors. Will probably start the year in Triple-A, where he only so far has 129 plate appearances, but seems to have an approach that might help him adapt and make more contact. Has a lot more to prove to earn a regular job.

I can't remember if it was last year that the Twins said Byron Buxton would DH in order to keep him healthy, but if it was it didn't work. It, whatever they plan, never works with Buxton, who has topped 400 plate appearances once. That was in 2017. The last two years he's increased his walk rate, but his strikeout rate has bounced up, too. He's hitting the ball hard and if he could only stay on the field, what an impact player he would be. The Twins plan this year is to have him play center field half the time, DH the rest, and have an alternative option ready in case (in other words, when) things go south.

He got off to a good start when he was called up last summer and stole some bases, but as the season wore on his playing time decreased. He's likely to be similarly limited this year if he makes the big league roster, but he has top 10-percent sprint speed and will run if he has the chance.

The Yankees have used him mostly in the outfield, but he's also filled in around the diamond playing every position but catcher last season. Last year he didn't show the power he has shown in the minors and in his rookie season, at least in part because he went from a heavy fly ball profile to a more balanced one. That helped him make more contact, but he hit 30 percent fewer line drives and his batting average suffered. Presumably he'll remain in a utility capacity this year, but with two options left he's a slump away from the minor leagues.

Started last year in High-A, spent most of his time in Double-A, and by the end had 36 major league plate appearances. Along the way he hit 32 homers. He's also got top quintile speed, though he hasn't stolen many bases on his way up. Given that major league taste last September and his success at Double-A last year, it's tempting to project him for the majors this year, but slow down. He's young and an aggressive hitter with some swing and miss right now. He could be promoted right out of camp, but my guess is the Rays are going to go a little slow with him this year. I wouldn't count on getting half a year of a power-hitting rookie with potential contact issues, but I would bet hoping that it happened. RAYS

Tore a ligament in his thumb in April and missed three months, later missed time with a groin pull, and ended the season on the IL with a sprained ankle. In between the Padres catcher of the future showed why the future is now. Or, rather, this year. He's an aggressive contact hitter with decent power and showed last year that he can handle big league pitching. Now he has to demonstrate durability and the ability to adjust.

Sprained his ankle after tripping over first base in a 2022-23 DWL game, which limited his minor league time last year. He has tremendous power and has put up big strikeout numbers every step of the way up through the minors, but he's also walked a lot. He saw 17 plate appearances with the Cubs last September and struck out 47.1 percent of the time without walking. I think there is a big chance of a bust here and thought I'd have some fun looking at some recent players who had such a short major league stint while qualifying as a rookie and struck out more than 40 percent of the time from 2015 to 2019, so we could get a feel for what they've become. Joey Gallo, I'm reminded, struck out 19 times in his first 25 at bats, so that's promising. Other names on the list: Yoan Moncada, Niko Goodrum, Hunter Dozier, Adolis Garcia, Dan Vogelbach, Christian Walker, and Jeimer Candelario. Lots of other players on that list are forgotten, but Adolis Garcia has turned into something of a star. He was 21 in 2018 when the Cardinals called him up for 17 plate appearances and he struck out seven times and walked none, almost like Canario, who struck out eight times. But Garcia had just 2 hits, Canario five, including a double, a triple, and a homer. Garcia didn't get back to the majors until 2021, when he was 28 years old. Canario turns 24 this year. CUBS

As a prospect he was a sum of the parts is greater than any individual part, meaning he did everything well if not great. But after a solid first full season he's struggled hitting righties, which seems to have shifted him into a potential platoon or backup role this year. He's been solid against lefties, but that's only a third of the chances. He's still young enough to emerge as a post-hype surprise, but the Cardinal outfield is still crowded and he might not get the chance.

I was skeptical that the power would be there last year, but it was in the first half. In the second half he was more of what I expected, with seven homers (vs 18 in the first half). Was this because of a midseason shoulder injury that cost him a few games, or because pitchers adjusted to him? You can't ignore an injury, but his didn't land him on the IL so it's probably more Occam's Razor to say it was the pitchers' work. There is a reason there is such a thing known as the sophomore slump, but Carroll is likely still getting better if not faster.

I wondered what the major league equivalency for a .189 batting average in 403 plate appearances would be. It turns out: .171. Even so the MLE for homers was 16, which isn't bad for a young catcher on his way up. Can he hit the ball enough to play regularly? The jury is out, but the last two years have been discouraging. His ability to judge and swing at only strikes doesn't seem to be coming along. But he is able to work walks, so there is some chance he'll figure that out. And his homer power is real. He also apparently has catching skills that are improving and close to major league ready. Worry about the batting average he brings, but revel in the power he's likely to show as soon as he's promoted. That could be this year. DODGERS

Impressive debut with surprising power. Expect the homer and steals rates to flip flop, and fewer strikeouts going forward. There is flop potential here, at least this year, as he's seen just 39 Triple-A plate appearances. A woeful start could land the youngster back in the minors for a time. RANGERS

With young players who struggled in their first taste of the bigs it's hard to escape the pull of recency bias. Most of these players will succeed at some point but not necessarily when they're 23. I'm saying this because my projection for Casas last year was very weak and his season was quite good, so I was very wrong. Last summer he started slowly but picked up steam as the season went along. He did lose starts against lefties and he lost time at first base (and at bats) because of struggles playing first base. His season ended in mid-September with a shoulder injury. Presumably he'll work on that and get more playing time if he hits lefties better, but he's struggled with that since Double-A at least. Hmm, I guess I'm still not fully on board.

He's got an alternating thing going in recent years, but in 2020 it was bad BABIP luck and in 2022 it was an inexplicable inability to barrel the ball. Neither was an issue last year and those who bought low on Castellanos did quite well. He won't be so cheap this year, but he might be good.

I took a shine to Rodolfo last spring. He has good patience and while he had contact issues he appeared to have surprising power and decent speed. He got off to a hot start playing for the Pirates, but the rest of the season was a dismal slog that he ended with the Phillies before being sent to minor league oblivion. Two years with a less than 14 percent line drive rate looks like a not very good trend.

He's always been quick and last year he turned that quickness and more times on base because he walked more into stolen bases. If he can hit 19 homers and steal 22 bases in 383 plate appearances, what might he do in 600? That's why he went for $29 last spring, but turf toe and other maladies (knee, hammy, oblique) plagued him all year long and he had October surgery to address the toe issue. He expects to be 100 percent healthy come spring training, but he (and we) also expected that last spring.

What Gunnar Henderson and Corbin Carroll were to last year's ROY prize in the preseason, Jackson Chourio is this year. With an MLE of 19 homers, a .258 batting average, and 35 steals, in Double-A, Chourio upped his game while stepping up a level. Like Jackson Merrill, his AL counterpart, youth and the possibility he won't see that much of the big leagues this year are the greatest concerns. Chourio's contact skills are fine, but not exemplary, and his achievements so far are promising but hardly at the highest level. The hype will be high, expectations, too, and his upside potential is great as well. For Henderson and Carroll last year there was risk, but they also had more than 24 plate appearances above Double-A. Chourio may break big out of the box, but there is a good chance he either won't or he won't even get into the box until later in the season. Keep that in mind when bidding. BREWERS

Otherworldly speed and a good idea about the strike zone so far in the minors, but contact issues crept up after he was promoted to Double-A last year. He takes a big swing and hits the ball hard, when he hits it, but he is going to need to convert huge tools into playable skills to earn regular playing time at the major league level. That's unlikely this year, with a possibility for 2025. We'll know much more after we see him in Triple-A as a 22 year old. MARINERS

It turns out that not every international find is worth finding. It also turns out that the hit tool matters. Colas may have great power, but he couldn't come close to finding it because he was constantly at the pitcher's mercy last year. Add in defensive issues and it is hard to see him generating much fantasy value this season, even if he gets a chance. Especially in mixed leagues.

If you attribute his weak 2021 to the shoulder issues that led to him missing all of 2022 after surgery, and if you attribute his weak 2023 to recovery from the surgery to fix his shoulder, you can concoct a case for a rebound. He continued to walk a fair amount and make contact before and after the surgery, but he just didn't hit the ball as hard. With nearly bottom-fifth Sprint Speed bat control is about all Conforto has shown since 2020, which means he'll turn a tidy profit if he does rebound.

It's funny how quickly he became the good Contreras. I expected him to hit more homers, but last year he was more of a line drive hitter than the year before and he made more contact, too. Interestingly, as a catcher, his baserunner ranks continued to be bad but he was much improved blocking the plate and pitch framing. A solid contributor already, and with a small adjustment he could put up big homer numbers.

The weird thing was that the Cards gave him the big contract and then complained about his defense, even benching him for a bit early in the season. He went on to bounce back, hitting for power and average in the second half, in limited at bats because of a series of small injuries that then ended with a season-ending wrist injury and IL stint. I'm not sure why his price jumped last year, his performance with the bat has been very consistent.

He makes a small profit every year because expectations are so low. That could happen again this year, but with modest power and limited at bats it's better to count on nothing from him instead of something, depending on where he lands.

What a difference small differences can make. A career low BABIP with a career-high hard hit rate spells F-L-U-K-E. He struggled with pain from plantar fasciitis most of the season, which surely didn't help, and landed on the IL late in September after he tore the thing, but he made it back for the playoffs and hit .409 in 24 at bats. He's had other down seasons and bounced back. Expect more of that this time.

He bombed in his first 77 plate appearances in the majors last summer, but showed the same excellent walk and concerning strikeout rates he'd had during his fine Triple-A season. He was much stronger versus righties last year than lefties in the minors, which combined with his brief major league stumble suggests he might return to Triple-A to start the season or work out of a platoon. When he does arrive he'll hit the ball hard and take plenty of walks, which depending on how much contact he makes will affect his playing time.

Changed his approach around at midseason, swinging harder and pulling the ball more and some homers came. He had a .395 SLG in the first half, a robust .492 SLG in the second. This is a better version of the 2021 JP, so there can be some confidence he'll do it some more

The No. 2 pick overall in the 2023 draft, Crews was a massively productive college hitter, going yard 58 times in three years with a 1.187 OPS. In the minors last summer he crushed the Carolina League, with a 1.068 OPS and stumbled in Double-A, with a .595 OPS in 85 plate appearances. It's fairly safe to say that it was a stumble, he has not topped out, though his high strikeout rates at both levels suggest that he's not going to be the high-average hitter he was at lower levels. That's not set in stone however, he'll be just 22 on Opening Day this year, still young to be playing in Double-A, and with any success at all will be fast-tracked to Triple-A and the majors, expected to hit with power at every level. But contact issues and breaking stuff at the higher levels can bedevil even talented young hitters. Perhaps it's a harbinger of good things that Crews walked more and struck out less at the higher level last year. He's expected to stick in centerfield because of his speed and range, and who doesn't like a power-hitting centerfielder? His future looks bright, but he may not make it to Washington this year (though he could). NATIONALS

He was hit by a pitch in late August and fractured his wrist, ending his season. The bone healed without surgery and he's expected to be ready when camps open. Signed a seven-year extension with the Padres that commences this year. He's a fine second baseman with a little pop, but he didn't generate enough production to offset batting average decline last year. He has in the past, so some bounceback is likely.

Started last season in Double-A and a .898 OPS earned him a promotion to Triple-A, where he was just fine (.829 OPS). When the Cubs brought him up in September, however, he struggled, striking out nearly 37 percent of the time. He did walk nearly 16 percent of the time, maybe because he didn't get a hit in 19 plate appearances. He'll get another chance this spring and should have success stealing bases, with enough power to keep him relevant. But he'll be on a short leash, he's still young, so don't get too invested in immediate success. CUBS

His power and speed potential, on display in 2022 in a partial season, seemed to be so great that he was bid up aggressively last year despite striking out nearly 35 percent of his plate appearances the year before. A broken fibula suffered during a home plate collision with Seby Zevala was supposed to knock him out for four months, but complications kept him out the whole year. Should be bid up to the mid-to-high twenties again, since there's no reason to expect a change in his skills, but the fact is that he's a 66 percent contact hitter in his major league career so far, which translates to a .225 or so batting average. His power and speed can offset that deficit quite a bit, but the rust from a year off and possible lingering post-surgery issues can't be ignored.

He may have been rushed a bit, promoted to the majors after only 63 Triple-A plate appearances, but they were really good ones. The surprising thing is that he primarily played in right field once he was called up, and won't have catcher eligibility in most leagues this year. Assuming he make the adjustments and improves his contact in the major leagues, he'll not only hit but he'll hit for power. Last year he struggled with a hand injury that landed him on the IL in August. All in all, expect better this year and root for him to catch enough games to become C eligible.

After he was called up in June he caused quite a stir. It felt like he single-handedly propelled the Reds into the pennant race, but then he stumbled. His second half OPS was only .628 and he struggled mightily against lefties, with an OPS of only .555, but he's young and still developing. He's always struck out a lot, at all levels, which has to be a tempering factor in this year's and future expectations. But his speed, raw power, and apparent ability to work the strike zone raise expectations. Still, he's young enough that he could end up back in Triple-A this year if he gets off to as slow a start as he ended last season with. Someone will pay that bid price, if he makes the team, but it isn't going to be me.

Didn't hit for three teams last year. Didn't hit for the Cards in 2022 and 2021. His defense might earn him a role in Chicago, and he's hit for power, but that makes him a desperation reserve pick in the deepest leagues.

No. 16 overall in 2022 out of James Madison University, he promptly broke his foot and then broke a toe while rehabbing, so he didn't make his pro debut until June 2023. He hit .360 in 165 High-A at bats, offering hope to the Guardians that an excellent hitter might be on his way to join Jose Ramirez. He'll start this year in Double-A presumably, building on his 28 plate appearances and a .364 average last year. GUARDIANS

He hit the ball harder last year and so hit more home runs. Balls in play didn't fall quite so often, so his batting average dipped. His .280

He hit the ball a lot harder last year, perhaps trying to prove himself worthy of the hard-hitting third sacker moniker, but the extra power came at the expense of contact. Can he marry his good contact skills and his aggressive approach with a power-hitters' hard swing? I won't say he can't, he's still young, but odds are he's going to end up in as big a utility role as his glove can get him. ATHLETICS

I've always liked this guy, but he never gelled. But last year he found his footing, hit the ball a little harder and got better results on balls in play. Not much power and dimming speed mean even if he plays he's not a big fantasy contributor, but in deep leagues guys who hit a legitimate .275 have value.

A quick start with plenty of contact made it look like he'd matured as a hitter, but his collapse in the second half (.610 OPS) cost him regular playing time and perhaps a meaningful role on this year's Rangers team. There's still potential value, he hits the ball hard, but also bust potential because of his contact issues. Careful here, his power and speed may not play in a crowded offense.

When he pulled the ball last year he had an OPS of 1.619, but when he went up the middle or the opposite way his OPS was below .550. Plus, he struck out in more than 31 percent of his plate appearances. So, it's all or nothing with Duvall. He missed two months after he injured the same wrist he'd had surgically repaired in 2022 while making a diving play in April, but didn't seem to suffer ill effects after he returned. He's an all or nothing option with an aging profile this year.

The serious drop in value reflected tiny across-the-board drops in production in large part due to more time batting ninth, less batting first. One issue was October wrist-surgery to clear up an inflammation problem that put him on the IL in July. The Cardinals

His xBA has never been higher than .249 and a decrease in BA would put a hit on his value, which is an argument for not bidding him up. Healthy power and speed numbers are helpful, of course, and he has hit better than .260 each of the last three years.

I dissed his hitting a few years ago, then the Reds made him their regular shortstop and he was a fantasy surprise. Then he did it again. Fantasy value doesn't always match the skill set, we have to remember, when opportunity knocks. The Twins used him as a utility guy after he returned from early-season oral surgery (he was hit in the face by a pitch). When he returned he was his usual contact-hitting self who managed to jerk some longballs over the left field fence. Some homers and a not-painful batting average aren't nothing, but his chances for more playing time aren't particularly good,

His season ended in September with a fractured finger that required surgery. He is expected to be fine for the start of Spring Training, but what is up in the air is whether he will again back up Salvador Perez or, if the Royals trade Perez, become the team's starting catcher. He's got decent contact skills and a bit of power and will be a fine second catcher if the Royals hold onto Perez, who is signed through 2025, and might be a real value if he gets more playing time.

For a while back around the turn of the decade Fletcher was not only a good fielder but a high-contact slap hitter who got on base a lot. That stopped in 2022 and he spent most of last year in Triple-A, earning major league money. Hard to say why the Braves targeted him as their backup guy, given he ain't coming cheap, but he has a sure and versatile glove.

Some power profit from a guy who qualifies at the corners and walks enough to post a good OBP if his BA doesn't tank. Sits too much for use in shallower formats.

He has exciting power and speed and admirable strike zone judgment (11.2 percent walk rate in the majors so far), but his contact issues in the majors have led to a nearly 31 percent strikeout rate. Leaving the Yank's crowded outfield for funky Cleveland, he'll try to put more good wood on the ball in a situation with a lot more opportunity. To the extent he earns at-bats, he should hit homers, steal bases, and get on base, but an average of .200 is much more likely than one of .250.

A three-true-outcomes bat from the left side, he's got a freaky .920 OPS against lefties, likely because he only sees the worst ones or the mediocre ones in meaningless situations (and anyway, it's only 108 plate appearances). He's hit 27 homers against righties, but has only a .691 OPS against them. Let's say, low impact power.

He makes lots of contact but has failed to generate hits the last two years. He hits lots of ground balls, but the problem last year was he also hit lots of fly balls. He had the fourth lowest line drive rate for hitters with 250 or more plate appearances, behind Joey Gallo, Giancarlo Stanton, and Rodolfo Castro. While line drive rate does fluctuate, he doesn't hit the ball hard and has only middlin' speed. With good luck he could have a nice year, but with bad luck he could have another like last year.

Walked more than he struck out last year in Triple-A and pumped up his barrel rate, hitting with power and even stealing double-digit bases. The Rangers had him splitting his time between second and third base, though the consensus is that he's more likely to end up at first base. Eric Longenhagen says he's a close comp to Yandy Diaz, which would be a good thing for the Rangers. Bat to ball skills like those are rare. He could be a somewhat under the radar prospect find, especially if he doesn't break camp with the big club, which he likely won't given they don't have a spot for him to play. RANGERS surgery when the season was over, but during the year he hit the IL multiple times. This is not unusual for him. But he hits righties enough to be worth an outfield slot in an only league.

His career OPS versus lefties is .482. Not good. He gets hurt a lot. His season ended with him hobbled by a big toe that required

He's a $30+ hitter if his legal/moral issues clear up, but there isn't any reason to think they'll clear up this year. He was arrested in the Dominican Republic on January 4th after he failed to report for a court date and was charged with commercial sex exploitation and money laundering. He was released on bail after the chargers were reduced to a misdemeanor, but that doesn't mean that things are looking up. Once the legal process is completed MLB will rule, as well. His chances of playing in the US this year are vanishingly small.

He's not a power-hitter, despite the 13 homers (only 11 barrels) and he's not a speedster (he was thrown out four times last year for a 73.3% success rate when the league average was 80%). His defensive metrics collapsed last season, too. He's not so old to be written off completely, but playing time and how long a leash will go a long way to determine his value this season.

Was called up by the Brewers in July after a lackluster half season in Triple-A. The results had been much better in 2022 in Triple-A, when he walked more than he struck out. His is not a power bat but he does have 20 stolen base potential. And with a nearly 90 percent contact rate (mostly against righties) there is the potential for him to be a plus batting average contributor.

The late-bloomer made a name for himself for his power-heroics in the post season last year, but also notably transformed himself last year from a free-swinging slugger to a patient one. He bumped his barrel rate from nearly 13 percent to more than 16 percent, explaining the increase in homers. Give the decline in steals to his age, as his sprint speed has dropped from Top Fifth to Average. He's not getting any younger but he is getting smarter. More homers ahead.

Pretty much all his value comes from volume, so far. That volume was diminished last year when he was sent to the minors in early August after a bad stretch coming out of the All Star break. He was a little better after he returned in early September, but the warning is there. He's not been a strong enough glove to carry weak offensive performance. He's young, was expected to be a major league regular when he was a prospect, so he has a little more time to establish himself, but at any price he's a risky play now.

My comp for him is Nico Hoerner, except Hoerner hits the ball hard 33 percent of the time. Garcia hit it hard per Statcast more than 50 percent of the time last year. So, Garcia trades some contact (he's still over 80 percent) for some power. Both are fast and good defensively. Hoerner exploded in the year he turned 24. My pick to click this year.

His season ended in early August with a fractured fibula when his leg got caught in the wall at Yankee Stadium. He's expected to be ready for spring training in February. He was platooned quite a bit, facing lefties as often as righties, and he did fine against both. He's patient but still struggles with contact, but has decent power when he gets a hold of one. He has top-quartile speed and was something of a basestealer in the minors, but was conservative last year. Contact issues might doom him, but there is some chance of a small breakout if he gets a chance to play.

He followed his last good season with the bat with three bad ones. Injuries were at least partly to blame. Now, after another good season and the Mariners have signed him on as their DH. With good contact skills, a power bat, and not much responsibility behind the plate, we should see him at or close to his best.

Short but strong, he makes plenty of contact and hits the ball hard with doubles power, so far. He was the Mets prize in the Verlander deal last summer, and should soon become their everyday center fielder. Without standout home run punch or stolen base glitz he should be a solid fantasy contributor in the second tier at some point this year. METS

He ran more but hit the ball less hard, which affected everything else. He finished the season strong, but that was batting average driven. Of course, so was his 2022 breakout. It's possible there's another big year for him, but until he shows he's swinging hard it's better to look at him as a stolen base resource who'll pop 15 homers or so.

We thought 2019 and 2020 were signs of decline but he bounced back the next two years. Last year his maxEV dropped to '19 and '20 type levels and. His xBA dropped to .267. Actually, 2022's .317 BA hid an xBA of .261 and despite that year's MVP award and big earnings it is more like 2023 than 2022. For what it's worth, 2024 is a contract year.

The good news is that he didn't strike out a lot more than he did in the minors after promotion to the big club. The bad news is that he didn't walk nearly as much as he did in the minors. The other bad news is that he struck out a lot in the minors, though he hit for power in Triple-A. He's too young to write off, but he's limited defensively and if the bat isn't helping he's going to have a hard time finding big league at bats.

A surprising rookie season was followed by a much more predictable one for this free-swinging outfielder with contact issues. Given his defensive limitations it's understandable he spent much of last summer in Triple-A trying to work things out. But when he came back he walked 2.9 percent of the time and struck out 29.5 percent, a ratio that among players with at least 150 plate appearances ranked third, behind Mickey Moniak and Edmundo Sosa.

He's been an offensive black hole the past two years, triggering memories of a Bill James essay about the way catchers fall apart after a certain number of games. That seemed true back in the early 80s, but it's certainly no longer universal. Still, Grandal's demise has been abrupt and almost complete. If he has a line on at bats he's worth a buck in deep only leagues with two catchers, but last year's expectation that he would bounce back was clearly a mistake.

Ended his season with TJ on his non-throwing elbow, which shouldn't affect his defense but according to interesting work by Jeff Zimmerman at Fangraphs is likely to trim his OPS by about .081 points. That's the average decrease the next year for 16 hitters after they had the operation. The problem for us is we don't really know what his OPS should be. His disappointing first year it was .682, while last year it was .796. If he is the average hitter we'd forecast him for .715, but can we call him an average hitter? He's young and improving and hit the ball hard last year, but only 11 of his 30 barrels left the yard. The point is, if he's getting better maybe the surgery penalty starts from a different baseline, so I'm going to spend a little more.

Started last year on the IL with the Rockies and ended it being waived repeatedly by the Angels after they traded for him at the deadline. Had fewer at bats versus lefties last year, against whom he's good, than the year before, while having roughly the same number against righties, against whom he's okay. That has to be mismanaging. Playing time a big issue in terms of future value, depending on where he lands as he moves on to the market.

Seems to have settled into a nightmarishly unhelpful fantasy level, but he does take walks. Also, now a fourth outfielder, but with notably good defense.

What a difference a year makes. Going into 2023 he was thought to be the Braves starting shortstop and a favorite to win the Rookie of the Year trophy. But the job went to Orlando Arcia instead and Grissom landed in Triple-A and hit, though he didn't smash the homers and steal the bases expected. What we've seen of him so far suggests an aggressive contact hitter with a little pop and a little speed — he only stole 13 bases last season and his Sprint Speed was very middlin'. He's young, but his move to the Red Sox means he's going to get a shot to play with Trevor Story and, the Sox hope, be a big part of their young offense. The homer and steals totals don't look to be big, but if he proves his contact and on-base skills he could end up near the top of that lineup soon.

He's been significantly better hitting right-handed versus lefties than as a lefty facing righties, and this was true in 2021, when he played full time for the Tigers and hit better than usual both ways. Still, better as a righty. His defense is enough of a liability to put his playing time at risk, but so far that hasn't happened. But after that surprising mid-career blip up he seems to be settling back down toward replacement level.

In his big 2021 season, playing his home games at small Dunedin and Buffalo ballparks because of the pandemic, he had a 1.119 OPS at home and a .885 OPS on the road. In 2022 it was .842 at home and .795 on the road. Last year it was .718 at home and .858 on the road. There's nothing wrong with being an .850 or so OPS hitter, assuming his struggles in Toronto were transient or are fixable. I think the superstar we hoped to see and then found in 2021 was a product of those small home ballparks, but that doesn't mean that Vlad Jr. is a bust.

Earnings wise, the last three years look similar but they in fact resemble a batting average sandwich on home run bread. Last year the homers returned to Gurriel's profile and his batting average, fueled by BABIP luck in 2022, returned to its usual level.

After two very pretty solid years in Detroit he bombed a third one. The reasons are obvious, he hit more grounders and fewer flies and he hit the ball less hard, so way fewer fly balls left the yard. The falloff doesn't seem to be injury related, but given his age you have to suspect that whatever perked up his bat in 2021 and 2022 has left the building. The Brewers signed him up for this year, an odd choice because he's a bat-first catcher backing up a bat-first catcher, though William Contreras has improved his game behind the plate. Haase not as much. He might be worth a $1 add in NL only leagues and pay off, but without upside.

He was paid in fantasy leagues as if he might be back some time after the the All-Star break following his TJ, but he was back in the lineup early in May and came out with guns blazing. He started hitting more fly balls the last two months and the power came roaring back. It was a bit of a thrill watching him come into his own in the second half last year after he returned from a month on the IL with back soreness. Finally, the Hayes I've been waiting for arrived. Kinda. We'll have to see if he can sustain the more aggressive power hitting into next season, which is especially important because his Sprint Speed dropped significantly last year. Maybe that was the back injury, but that's also what happens as newbies become veterans.

First half hot streak was fired by BABIP luck which regressed to somewhere around the mean in the second half, and his value collapsed, too. The combo of the two halves probably reflects his talent, but also demonstrates that he's not an interesting player. Has power but doesn't hit that many home runs (11th from the bottom on the xHR-HR list), and has some speed (53rd percentile Sprint Speed) but doesn't run much. He could lose his job and would anyone notice?

The main difference last year compared to 2022 was that he hit more line drives, so more balls fell in for hits. He's a fairly patient hitter, knows the zone, and makes decent contact. He's been a significantly better hitter as a righty against lefties than as a lefty against righties, but his defensive chops should earn him plenty of playing time both ways (and he was better batting lefty last year).

Got off to a slow start getting hits, but walked so much it didn't matter. He showed the power expected with potential for more to come. The only issue is his performance against lefties, with a .618 OPS against them (and an .883 OPS against righties). His defense is strong enough to keep him out there against them, which unless he figures out an approach is going to hurt his batting average.

Seattle did not agree with him (.643 OPS at home, .830 on the road) but he's moving on to LA this winter. His batting averages have hinged on him getting hits on balls in play, his contact rate suggests something more in the .230 area should be expected. So far, in recent years he's defied that, but at some point he might not.

Not a bad hitter in the minors but hasn't done much in limited major league exposure. His playing time was undercut last year when Willson Contreras resisted moving out from behind the plate. He's patient and has made decent contact in Triple-A, which along with a bit of power makes him a better choice in NL Only leagues than some catchers who will play more.

Making the Dodgers last year was a feel-good story, but really he just played enough to have some only-league value. With just a little defensive value and a platoonist's limitations he could easily fall off rapidly once again.

A catcher who hits enough to earn a positive value, even $1, is a treasure if you can pay $1 for him. And last year with Higashioka you could. He's a strong defensive player who will pair well with Luis Campusano and won't hurt you as much as some other catchers might.

He dropped to the 80th percentile in Sprint Speed last summer, but solid bat to ball skills helped him to a solid batting average with surprising power how infrequently he barrels the ball. He happily joined the stolen base orgy last summer and as long as he can do that he'll be a solid fantasy contributor.

In his first full year in the minors, last year, he played at four levels and put up, in ascending order of level, OPSes of 1.122, .940, .928, and .796. With only 91 plate appearances in Triple-A we shouldn't expect him to start the season in the majors, but clearly if he rakes the trip to Baltimore is a short one. Holliday was the No. 1 overall in 2022 out of high school. He was named Keith Law's Prospect of the Year, reflecting best-in-class performance in 2023. He walked more than he struck out in Triple-A last year, and reportedly looked great playing shortstop, though the team also had him play second (13 games) and third (1 game). Law wrote that at third he looked like a shortstop, whatever that means. He comes with a fine pedigree, his dad is former Rockie and Cardinal Matt Holliday, who won four Silver Slugger awards in his day. The challenge will be how much to pay if your league allows you to draft guys who start the season in the minors. In an AL-only that allows you to keep him at his draft price the next year I'd say $14 is a fair bid, only because he has yet to show the power that will surely come as he matures and because, while he could be up in late April, a slow start might keep him down until July. He tore his ACL while playing in a Spring Training game last year and after surgery missed the whole season. He was reported close to a return in the postseason, so he should be ready for camp in February. He's been a productive hitter when able to take the field, but has a somewhat checkered injury history.

I'm a little bit of a fan, he looks to me like he's going to be more than has been so far, but that's far from a sure thing and he's getting old enough where a little slump could cost him playing time and fantasy value. But his defense should earn him another long look, and his contact skills while hitting the ball hard enough could pay dividends. He's going to hurt you in OBP leagues unless he hits .300, but a full season of 15 homers, 15 steals, and a .255 batting average would be valuable in an only league given what he's going to cost this Spring.

Some early-season injuries cost him playing time and allowed Ezequiel Duran to get off to a hot start, but when Jankowski was healthy Bruce Bochy found him at bats versus righties. He's reduced his swing, so he makes plenty of contact and he's happy to draw walks, which makes him a fairly one-dimensional stolen base threat unless you play in an OBP league. Now he has a ring, but will he find more at bats this season?

The difference between 2021 and 2023 is an almost 10 percentage point drop in strikeouts and a nearly 90 point increase in BABIP. Jeffers' xBA last summer was a more reasonable .234, which means he's not a $10 catcher, but his power probably means he's worth rostering in deep leagues.

He didn't get a real shot at the majors until he was 28 because he's not a good fielder and lacks power. Since he arrived he's shown that he's patient with good strike zone judgment but lacks power. He also lacks the ability to do damage to righty pitchers (.717 OPS against). That makes him perhaps a useful fill-in in only leagues that use OBP.

Hitting-starved Cleveland let this power prospect go because of how much he struck out at every step in the minors, but he also took a lot of walks and demonstrated in the friendly confines of Coors Field that he can play. Especially during a monstrous September, when he hit .349 with seven homers and 12 steals. The bump in stolen bases was a pleasant surprise. His .400+ BABIP suggests that his BA will come down. Statcast says his xBA last year was .247, which in this day and age isn't bad but it is less valuable for fantasy.

He struck out a horrific amount and had a great BABIP, neither of which is a positive leading indicator, but he hits the ball pretty hard a lot of the time and he has terrific patience at the plate. At this point he's either a big boom or a big bust in the next year or two.

Split last year between High-A and Double-A and he showed plenty of power and good patience. He is a serious pull-hitter who hit more homers than doubles last year and will be tested by more advanced pitching. He hit just one homer in 65 plate appearances with a .200 batting average in the Arizona Fall League, but walked 14 times. He played third base there but mostly second base in the minors last year, and is considered a defensive project at best. TIGERS

A very solid rookie season, hitting consistently and with power when he wasn't hurt. He did miss six weeks with a fractured left thumb, which cut down his earnings. He strikes out more than you'd like and walks less, which should temper expectations some, but his swing is solid enough he could suddenly improve quite a bit. Not saying it is this. year, though it could be, but he has a potentially huge power year in him.

A .976 OPS in nearly 300 plate appearances in Double-A last year got him promoted to Triple-A, where he had a .890 OPS over a bit more than 300 plate appearances. But the headline figure is 27 homers at the two levels. The MLE for that is 18 homers and a .265 batting average, which puts the youngster in such company as JD Davis and Keibert Ruiz last year. In other words, a very playable league-average hitter right off the bat, with potential for a good deal more. The fly in the ointment is Keith's defense, which by all reports is not great. Without knowing how he fits into Detroit's lineup we have to be a little cautious, but a low price makes me even more enthusiastic. TIGERS

When the Mets traded him in that deal for Robinson Cano and Edwin Diaz they were criticized relentlessly, but in Seattle he struggled to make contact in 2021 and 2022 and the high expectations of 2022 gave way to a lot of skepticism last year. Then, he got off to a very hot start and all the Mets boo birds reemerged, but he couldn't sustain the pace or even enough of it. He ended up with a first-half OPS of .755, which is just barely enough for a corner outfielder, and, after missing all of August with a fractured foot after kicking a water cooler (ouch), followed it with a .707 OPS in the second half. He sat frequently against lefties, though he hit the lefties he did face just fine. The concerning part is that he struggled against all pitches except fastballs, and had a 31.3 percent strikeout against four-seamers, which means there is much more to do for him to address what ails him. Still, there is potential for surprise here, which is why the Braves when out of their way to trade for him.

Will be the Tigers backup catcher this year, and given his limited power and weak batting averages and limited playing time, he's probably not worth an add. Especially with Colt Keith hovering, maybe too often over passed balls.

When you hit the ball as weakly as Kemp does you can't really call a bad BABIP bad luck. It might be, but slowly hit balls are easier for fielders to snag and throw. He's been stealing enough to have some value when his batting average and playing time have been up, but it's hard to see a team other than the Athletics let him play so much.

Bounced back from an injury-plagued season to produce at a higher level, but served pretty much as a platoonist last year. He's been a top prospect for so long it's kind of hard to believe he's still just 27 this year (September birthday). But he's also had 508 major league plate appearances with 12 homers and a .585 OPS, including a .188 batting average. He works the strike zone just fine, but when it comes to hitting there's no there there. He might be a good fit in Oakland.

Had an IL stint in August for a laceration and stitches on his forearm and missed other time with back, knee, and bug issues. The Jays said in the preseason he would not platoon, but when he sat it was usually against lefties. Re-signed by the Blue Jays, he'll be on the field for his elite defense in centerfield and he'll have fantasy value because of his elite speed. But he's also tended to injury throughout his career, so caution is advisable.

As expected, IKF lost his starting job last year and with limited at bats came limited fantasy value. His defensive flexibility (and skill at shortstop) mean the at bats could return in Toronto, and given his contact skills and speed he could regain at least some of the fantasy value he had before last year, even if he ends up in a utility role.

His performance fell off so much last year that it's tempting to blame an injury or underlying condition, but his hitting was just as underwhelming before his June hand injury (laceration) as after it. He hit the ball less hard and at a lower angle than the year before and lost out on DH plate appearances because of it. Fewer at bats and less power are a bad combination, which is why Kirk's season was so disappointing. He's one of the games slowest players, so he isn't going to be beating out slowly hit grounders. He may recapture some of 2022's shine, but probably not come close to meeting those expectations.

He was drafted in 2020, No. 2 overall out of Arkansas, when there was no minor league play. But he didn't lose much then because he was diagnosed with myocarditis shortly after signing. He'd gotten past that when a hamstring strain landed him on the IL for the first half of 2022. When he finally got onto a professional field he crushed Low-A and High-A pitching, then went to the Arizona Fall League and was the MVP. Last season he owned Double-A, handled Triple-A, and struggled in the majors, where he hit two homers in 33 plate appearances but struck out 10 times. That's too few PA to judge how he's going to adjust to the big leagues, but scouts see strong wrists, a decent eye, and a tight body that lengthens out his swing and could make it tough for him in the majors. It would be foolish to write him off at this point, but don't get too excited just yet. He has big power potential but that may not be enough.

After a year where his BA was 30 points above his expected batting average and another when his BA was 15 points below his xBA it feels like we're circling around the type of hitter he is. He is selective and makes a lot of contact but doesn't hit the ball hard. That makes his value very dependent on just how lucky he is.

He showed a little underlying improvement over his rookie season, and with increased playing time swatted a nice lot of long balls. He swung and missed a lot, too, and so far at the major league level hasn't been able to draw walks as he did in Triple-A. Expect some more improvement in that direction, but it's hard to imagine a helpful (and honestly earned) batting average going forward.

The No. 4 overall in 2023, he played at four levels last summer. He raked in all four albeit in small samples. Assuming he gets off to a quick start in Triple-A this year the only place left to get tested is Dallas. A strong and patient contact-making power hitter? What's not to like. RANGERS

Moderate power with a heavily swing-and-miss accent and null defensive value means his playing time will be challenged. He walks enough and has enough power that he might get another chance, but he also has one option left, which might make him a better fit in Triple-A this year. A waiver wire target when he gets the call.

The Diamondbacks called him up after just 80 plate appearances in Triple-A because he put up an OPS of 1.050 there, hitting five homers. In the majors in September he didn't hit and and played infrequently down the stretch, ending up with a .335 OPS in 34 at-bats. He was the No. 6 overall in 2021 as a power-hitting and speedy shortstop with the defensive chops to stay there as he matured. He may not grow up to be a high-average guy but should walk enough and hit with enough power to be a big-league star, maybe as soon as this year. The chance that it's going to take another year, or even three months, should keep his price down until there is spring training news.

Questions about his durability stalk him, but his solid discipline and judgment skills at the plate have him moving up on prospect lists. He didn't blow them away after promotion to Triple-A, where he's likely to start this season, but he's likely to see the majors at some point this season unless flops. He's solid across the board but without major homer and steals skills, limiting his fantasy upside.

He jumped from high school directly to the KBO and was the league MVP in 2022. His season ended early last year because of a broken ankle. In Korea, he has walked twice as much as he's struck out, which has been less than eight percent of the time in each season since he turned 20. As a teenager, he struck out 10.8 and 11.2 percent of the time. In his MVP season, he hit 23 homers so he's not without power. I'm jazzed about him as a high batting average on-base machine, who also has a little pop. Not a big fantasy star but a very solid contributor. GIANTS

A defense-first catcher, he's had two short trials in the majors the last two years and hasn't hit a lick. Imagine a .323 OPS, if you can, in 96 plate appearances. Still, the White Sox traded for him last July and waived Seby Zavala, whose .622 OPS over 514 plate appearances wasn't very good but towers above Lee so far, and Zavala was good defensively, too. Lee will surely do better going forward with the stick, he hit 25 homers in Triple-A in 2022, but will surely also be a batting average drain.

His ability to make contact on strikes last year plummeted for some reason, and he struck out more and hit for the worst batting average of his career. He had a similar less-pronounced dip back in 2018, so maybe this isn't permanent, but back then he was an ace defender and he no longer is. Tread carefully, a rebound is not impossible but unlikely, leading to less playing time. He still has three years to go on his contract with the Yankees.

The .323 batting average after his September callup is glitzy, but he didn't hit the ball hard and his xBA was just .245. It's a small sample, but despite his good contact skills he's not a great defender and a weak profile at the corner outfield and infield positions. Traded to the White Sox in that big deal for Aaron Bummer, he'll look to regain playing time for a team starting a painful rebuild. His explosive 2021 season was powered by a super-high BABIP and 22 steals in a year in which steals were down. If he ends up on the strong side of a platoon he might end up with a little value.

Sat a lot against lefties last year and was helpless when he did see them. Missed most of June with a herniated disk and his season and playoffs ended a little early with a broken patella caused by a hit by pitch. When on the field against righties he drew walks, hit homers, and drove the ball to right field on the ground and in the air a lot. His career performance is so pocked by erratic playing time and injury it's hard to bet we're going to see the good Lowe this year, but there is a chance he'll show up.

The scouting reports said lots of speed and power arriving in 2022, but that didn't happen. Last year he got off to a hot start, survived a summer slump and finished strong. During the slump he reverted to the swing and miss style he showed in 2022, but he recovered. A lower batting average and more homers are likely this year.

We got the Nathaniel Lowe we wanted in 2022, but last year he went back to being the old Lowe and posted the lowest (pun intended) Barrel rate of his career. He also had the highest xBA of that career, which may be the point. The tension between being an aggressive power hitter and a patient line-drive hitter is there in his statbox. He'll choose his own profile this year, you're just along for the ride.

He has great power but missed time in 2022 and early 2023 because of a stress fracture in his back. He also swings and misses a lot. Almost 30 percent in Double-A last year, and more than 36 percent in limited time in Triple-A and the majors last year. It isn't that he doesn't know the strike zone, he walks a lot, like a power hitter, but he swung and missed more than 16 percent last year, which isn't the worst but is a lot. The Giants plan to give him a shot at the starting shortstop job this year but he's going to have do better with the stick to stick in the lineup.

Tore his ACL and LCL in spring training and missed all of 2023. He was running and hitting some in August and is expected to be ready for Spring Training. Some caution is always advised for guys coming back from serious surgery, but he's young and chances are good he'll be good. The bigger issue is he has yet to show the power and speed that was expected. Might it come this year?

Missed three weeks in May/June with a fracture in his hand, missed time in August with a knee sprain, and was relegated to DH in September with an elbow sprain that required surgery the day after the season ended. Recovery time is 4-6 months, so he could miss spring training. The question is whether the injuries are a harbinger of more injuries as he grows older or just last year's freak occurrences. It's encouraging that he reached 600 plate appearances even so.

He landed in the Cleveland organization from Tampa last summer, in the Aaron Civale deal, and he's expected to be a big leaguer this year, pumping up the Guardians' weak offense. What I saw in the AFL was a guy who could not get around on high heat. He's a big solid guy but hard fastball after hard fastball he fouled off just a little late, and these were not Jhoan Duran heaters. I made a note about this and was gratified to learn later that he hit .167 against high fastballs last year. That doesn't sound promising, but I'm told that he's also recovering from a shoulder injury and it's possible that's part of the problem. We'll see. He was named the first baseman on the All-AFL First Team, but I'm not excited. GUARDIANS

After a couple of down years plagued with hamstring issues, Marte stayed healthy and regained much of the productivity he showed in his career year in 2019. He did post his lowest contact number in his career for the second year in a row and his Sprint Speed is down from a high of 95th percentile (2017) to 56th, though that is bump up from 44th and 41st the last two years. He's a solid middle-of-the-road contributor at second base when healthy.

I saw Marte in Arizona in 2022 and he looked terrible, but the scouts all said he was tired and they projected him to be a big-league star. A year later and three stints spread between Double-A (222 PA), Triple-A (167 PA), and the majors (123 PA, so ROY eligible in 2024) and I'm going to go along with the scouts. Provisionally, because while he hit the ball hard in the majors and had an okay percentage of barrels, he hit more than twice as many grounders as fly balls. Still, he hit them hard enough that this xBA was .296, which is not too shabby, and with a Sprint Speed in the top 10 percent of major leaguers, he's going to put pressure on defenses. But, he happened to be solid against the hard stuff and struggled a bit against offspeed and breaking pitches. Which means pitchers are going to lean that way and he's going to have to adjust. I'm not saying he won't, but there is the possibility he won't, which should serve as a coolant heading into this year, along with the fact that it's hard to hit grounders for homers. But a speedy contact-heavy third baseman has great value, even if the homers don't come in bunches at first.

We expected him to lose playing time as his power declined, but apart from a back injury early in the season and hamstring troubles in August he played the consummate slugger, launching the ball higher and harder than ever before. With advancing age these injuries are increasingly likely, so Martinez should be fairly cheap and fairly risky for 2024.

You have to like the power last year, and the year before, and the year before that. The question is where he'll play. Lately he's seems to settle at second base, but if he doesn't advance to the big club this year it's likely because they're working on defensive issues. BLUE JAYS

He's terrible against lefties but has some power against righties and is decent at second base, so he'll get the strong side of the platoon at bats for the Royals. Expect a weak batting average and on base percentage, but a little homer power and 400 or so plate appearances isn't nothing. And maybe he'll improve a bit, he had good BAs in the high minors.

He's fast, plays decent defense, and surprised us in 2022, but after a quick start last year his limitations came to the fore and his playing time was substantially reduced. He just doesn't hit enough to play regularly on a contending team. If he gets the playing time he'll steal a lot of bases and should not be ignored, but he'll do it with a power hitter's woeful batting average.

The Giants top prospect going into last year put the ball in play but just wasn't all that productive last year. He's just 22 this year so there is potential development coming, but he looks like a bat control guy without much power or speed, best for BA leagues, ideally NL Only.

He tore his ACL while playing in the Dominican Winter League. After January surgery he's expected to be out until August or so. He's big and strong and the Mets have a shortstop, so he played second base for the most part when they called him up last September. In 108 plate appearances in the majors he didn't show the 20 homer power he's shown in the minors the previous three years, but his weak walk rate didn't deteriorate. Alas, he did strike out a lot more. If you've seen him play in the minors you have seen him look powerful, athletic, and electric at times, and kind of weasly and unfocussed at others. I didn't see him with the Mets last year, but his best hope is to mature and build off the Dominican Winter League MVP award he won before the 2023 season. Consider him high variance, a potential star who might end up hanging on as a utility guy.

Split 2023 between Double-A and Triple-A and hit at both levels. He hit for power, too. He's very selective and for a power hitter makes good contact. He made 43 errors at third base last year, for a .908 fielding percentage. That isn't good and the Orioles had him playing first base, too. Defense matters, but if he hits at Triple-A to start the season the way it looks he might he'll push his way into the big leagues. ORIOLES

In 2022, his rookie season, he hit the ball hard enough and to the right spots to put up a surprisingly solid batting average. Last year he didn't hit the ball as hard and didn't end up with an elevated BABIP and his average fell to a better indicative level, similar to his 2022 xBA. A .250 hitter with speed and stolen base smarts can have value, but McCarthy's defensive deficiencies (average range, weak arm) hurt his opportunities for regular play last year and are likely to this year as well.

Given his age and the partial Achilles' heel tear that ended his season last year, coming back seemed unlikely, but the Pirates have signed him on for another year. He was still effective last year, but the injury risk this year is sky high. Maybe the DH role will protect him, but for me he's an endgame fill in and potentially profitable.

The difference this year is that he's out of options, so he stands a good chance of being the Orioles fourth or fifth outfielder, depending on how you count. He hasn't shown enough with the bat to inspire confidence, but he's fast enough to steal bases to the extent he plays.

His value is going to come if he can get 400 at bats again, because he's got a little power and a little speed but only hit .230 against right-handed pitching last year and has a career .221 mark. But defensive flexibility counts, so he might play a similar role this year.

His hot Triple-A start last year coupled with scant production from their shortstops led the Reds to promote him last May, and he just hit from the get go. He did sprain his shoulder in August and aggravated it again during rehab in late September, ending his season early, but his very productive middle of the season was a revelation and helped propel the Reds into the playoff picture. He was a first-round pick in 2021 because of his college power and speed, which he ably demonstrated when healthy last summer. The big question then was his control over the strike zone and ability to make contact, which despite his success last year might be a problem going forward. His Statcast xBA was .250, a more likely number going forward than last year's inflated one, and caution is advised as big league pitchers develop a better book on him. His skills look more like those of a solid everyday starter than a fantasy star.

A solid Triple-A season last year was interrupted by the IL after being plunked on his wrist by a pitch in the minors, costing him a bit more than a month, and an August tour in the majors. He returned to the majors after the minor league season ended, and in total held on but didn't show the productive bat he did down on the farm. He fits with the Rays because he's defensively flexible, makes contact, and has shown good strike zone judgment and discipline in the minors, and he hits with power. How much he will actually play this year is a little up in the air, and his likely limited stolen base production caps his value even if he does. Ideally, pay a modest price on AL Only and be a little surprised if he gets the at bats.

The fundamentals are there. Hits for power, is fast, plays good defense, knows the strike zone. He's even improving making contact, with last year's xBA of .248 more representative of his skills than the .232 he posted. Some leagues use 10 games played for eligibility and they will have Melendez as a catcher this year, but for everyone else he's an outfielder only. Not a good outfielder, mind you, but probably less dangerous than as a catcher. He hits the ball hard and had plenty of barrels last year, but those didn't convert to the amount of homers expected of him. He's patient and with good zone judgment, so while his contact skills have been weak since he reached the majors he's only been disappointing, not a disaster. It's not unreasonable to expect better.

Faded in the second half after a solid first half and lost playing time as a result, ending up with numbers similar to his disappointing 2022. He made his major league debut as a 27 year old, and as we've noted time and again, late bloomers often decline sooner than players who reach the major leagues when they're younger. The concern here has to be a continued decline in playing time and a crash in value. Be wary.

After missing time with a fractured wrist and hamstring strain in 2022, he started last year in High-A and was promoted to Double-A at the All Star break. His slash lines at the two levels are almost identical, with a .762 OPS at the lower level and a .782 OPS at the higher one. He struck out 12.3 percent and 11.8 percent of the time respectively. He's not likely to see much of the majors this year, but we're also seeing teams promote more aggressively, so it's not out of the question, especially if he gets off to a hot start in Triple-A. But when he arrives he's expected to develop into a high batting average hitter with some pop and some steals, a solid big league regular with somewhat less fantasy value. What we call, better at the real game. PADRES

In Triple-A the last two years he's been a slugging contact hitter with great plate discipline. That feels like an unbeatable combination, but as we know all too well from experience hitters aren't truly tested until they reach the big leagues. The Cubs called Mervis up last May and we quickly learned that he quickly learned that major league pitching is different. For many hitters the problem is the breaking ball. Pitchers in the majors are better at throwing curves and sliders for strikes, but for Mervis the problem was everything. He struggled against heaters and curves and sliders, he struggled against lefties and righties, at home and on the road. The thing is, once he was sent back down to Triple-A he went back to being the same ol' power-hitting prospect with good contact skills he was before he hit Chicago, which has everyone thinking he smells like a Quad-A hitter, a guy who excels in the minors highest level but has a fatal flaw against big league pitching. That may be true, but it is also true that many eventual major league regulars struggle in their first 100 major league plate appearances, and that's all Mervis has so far. So it's not unreasonable to hope that Mervis is one of those, if his price reflects the general opinion that he was an unusual prospect who was overhyped and failed (because he might be that, too).

A very solid short stretch in Double-A led to a longer test in Triple-A and even 33 major league plate appearances in September. He's a very solid defensive catcher with excellent strike zone judgment and good contact skills, but with the power profile so far to excite fantasy players. He's fast for a catcher but hasn't stolen many bases, perhaps because he's battled injuries since he made his professional debut in 2021. Not a high impact fantasy talent, but catchers who can hit for average and get on base have their uses.

Spring Training shoulder issues didn't keep him from winning the starting third base job for Minnesota last year, but he struggled with the bat and the glove until he was shut down and eventually had September surgery. If he's not a third baseman, and he's now blocked there in Minnesota, his career .706 OPS doesn't play in a corner outfield slot or at first base. Assuming he's healthy he should be better this year, it's just hard to see where he finds at bats.

Tore up his shoulder in April and wasn't able to get back until late September. He's got great potential power and is super quick, but the hit tool lags behind, though his walk rate increased and strikeout rate decreased last year over his first taste of the majors in 2022. Still, striking out 35 percent of the time is going to make it hard to force his way into a crowded outfield situation in Milwaukee. Worth a flyer as a fifth outfielder in NL only, he's not guaranteed success if his role increases this year.

Good fielding could win him a utility or platoon job and his speed might earn him some only-league profits, but the possibility of doing more depends on him hitting for a high average because he has little power.

It feels like forever since he was the No. 1 pick in the draft (2016) but he finally arrived last year. He's a platoon guy, it seems, much better against righties than lefties. As last season progressed he got more of a full-time role and he struggled a little. He walks too little and strikes out too much to bet big on, even against righties, but as an outfield endgame pick he has power and some speed.

He's had stabs at the big leagues each of the last two years and has shown pretty consistent skills each time. Aggressive with plenty of swing-and-miss, he's equally inept against lefties and righties but has taken all his home field in Denver offers. A road OPS well below .600 is unplayable, and a home OPS well above .850 likely obscures a better future for some other hitter, probably. It's premature to say he can't figure this out, he showed solid contact in Triple-A (an extreme hitter's park), but nearly 500 plate appearances by a 25 year old starts to get convincing.

Where did the homers go? He didn't hit the ball as hard last year, though he did hit it more and on the ground. He did spend a month midseason on the IL with an illness that caused vertigo and made the ball look to be the size of a pea. Given that he was fine when he returned (until another stint on the IL at season's end with a sore shoulder) expect a return of the homer stroke this year when the ball looks to be the size of a baseball.

A variety of aches and pains, paternity, and one 10-day IL stint cost him at bats last year. So did his weakness against left-handed pitching (.642 OPS versus .881 against righties). The Braves traded William Contreras to get him last offseason and the two put up very similar numbers, even defensively, which is where Murphy was supposed to have the edge. The big difference was that Murphy was rested regularly by the Braves, while the Brewers played Contreras in 33 games as the DH. Murphy will be back behind home plate again this year, paired with Travis d'Arnaud, and the Braves will likely not be playing Murphy as the DH, so expect similar results.

Was sent to the minors by the Reds in June after a terrible start to the season, an absence due to COVID, and a shoulder sprain he was rehabbing. He was terrible in Triple-A and the club released him. He didn't sign elsewhere or play the rest of the season. He floundered in 2022 and started last year on the IL with a strained calf, then became the backup to the nearly full-time Francisco Alvarez. He hit more barrels last year and looked more like the hitter he was in 2019 and 2021, but he didn't get nearly the at bats. His meager batting average was fairly unlucky. He exercised his option to stay with the Mets another year, limiting his offensive potential.

Promoted in June, after a slow start he showed a little of what he's expected to do. His second-half OPS was .893. He hit for power and stole some bases and took plenty of walks. His pull-heavy approach so far is vulnerable, but his ability to control the strike zone means there is plenty of upside, too. A power-hitting backstop with on-base skills is quite a catch.

He's got a sweet stroke and hits the ball hard so he should always have a decent batting average. Last year's xBA was .290, which feels right. His stroke is tailored more for line drives than flies, though he did hit more balls in the air last year, perhaps signaling a power adjustment. The Guardians stuck with him during a slow start and he hits lefties, so to the extent he stays healthy he should play regularly going forward. Don't count on more steals, his Sprint Speed is in the 16th percentile, but he has been opportunistic the last two years. That doesn't hurt at all.

A first-rounder in 2022, he marched up through the minors last year and landed with the Angels in mid-April after a hot Double-A start. He struggled through a variety of injuries as the season progressed but showed a little of the power and speed combo the Angels were hoping for. He's still on the big-league learning curve, so significant improvement is possible, but some who are promoted so aggressively struggle to get the hang of it.

Could prove useful to a major league team because he can play multiple positions and is a good enough hitter versus lefties, but against righties he's not so effective. His record has that notable 2019 season, when he hit .308 with 12 homers, which he has not come close to replicating since. And there's not reason to expect he will.

He didn't hit enough homers to justify playing him with a 34 percent strikeout rate, but he walked so crazy much that he's totally playable as an on-base guy who homers some. Part of the problem last year was the ballpark in Oakland, maybe. His OPS there was .703 versus .832 on the road. Kyle Schwarber has managed to thrive in the majors with a similar profile but a totally different career arc. Noda's in a good spot in Oakland's lineup (not much competition) but he is no Schwarber. He's worth a small bet, especially if you play in an OBP league.

Walks and strikes out at rates that are pretty good, but you get the feeling that expectations are unrealistically high for him because everyone wants to see the Nootbaar on candy shelves. He struggled against lefties last year, but in general in his career he's been fine hitting them. Just as fine as against righties, but that's the problem. Just fine doesn't drive roto profits. He was hurt last year by the overstocked Cardinal outfield, and he definitely helps them when he plays because he gets on base and he plays good defense. But so far he just doesn't hit the ball hard enough to break out of the fantasy only-league box.

Just when I stuck a fork in him, he returned. Well, his batting average rose, putting this past season well above his similar (apart from BA) 2019 campaign. xBA in 2019 was .226, while last year it was .263. A career year! Nice, but also a warning. He's still stuck, he just hasn't stopped yet.

Tore his labrum in April and missed four months, but had a .759 OPS after he returned in August, with 10 homers in 140 plate appearances. He didn't show the discipline or bat control last year that he demonstrated coming up through the minors, but that's a reason for optimism. His success last year as a power hitter is somethng to build on and we should expect more with the bat going forward. Of more concern were his struggles as a catcher, which if not remedied could lead to other issues. For now he qualifies behind the plate, which gives him extra appeal.

His terrific 2021 season seemed like the full expression of his strong physical talents, but as healthy and somewhat lucky as he was that year he's been unhealthy and unlucky in the two years since. He also hasn't hit the ball nearly as hard as he did in what is looking like his career year, which may be because of the injuries or maybe because he was trying to improve his contact skills. They did in fact improve the last two years, but as a result he hit the ball more softly which is not what anyone wants. Memories of '21 are going to drive his price this year as he's newly introduced to AL-only leagues, which should make him a bit riskier. I'll go part of the way there, but likely not all the way to get him.

I'm concerned about the surgery. Injury data from Jeff Zimmerman suggests a 20-percent drop in OPS the year after elbow surgery (mostly TJ). Twenty percent of $40 makes him a $32 player, but 20 percent of $35, which is more his average earnings the past three years, makes him a $28 player. I think that's more what I'm willing to pay this year. Note: Jeff's data is a pretty small sample, if I remember correctly he has 11 points, so it wouldn't be wrong to go past $28, but I think there's a better chance of Ohtani earning $21 this year than there is of him earning $35, so for now I'm stopping there.

For years fantasy players have been asking the Royals to give Olivares more of a chance. They kind of did last summer, though he sat pretty regularly (though not all the time) against righties. He hit enough early in the season to intrigue a little, but then an oblique strain cost him much of July and when he slumped upon return he was sent back to Triple-A. There he crushed it and when he was called back up he finished with a big September, hitting six homers with a .329 batting average in 77 plate appearances. The Royals reluctance to give him a full shot has to lower expectations, and at this point he's a late-bloomer longshot to break out this season, but he has enough power, speed, and contact skills to remain of interest. The Royals dealt him to the Pirates in December, which may prove to be a very smart move for one of these teams. We just don't know which one.

He's known as a defense-first shortstop with lots of positional versatility, lots of contact ability, and little power, though he did hit 19 homers in 2022 split between Double-A and Triple-A. In his brief time with the Orioles last spring he didn't hit, but it's too soon to write him off. He is, however, blocked by about a billion other shortstops in the Orioles system, so projecting playing time for him this year is difficult. And even if his situation improves, he's going to have to hit more to hold onto more than a utility role.

An .836 OPS versus righties, but only .665 against lefties, against whom he was benched quite a bit. And he struck out nearly 32 percent of his at bats. His defense might keep him in games, but a platoon-ish role limits any potential upside.

Before he tore his labrum, in his first game after promotion to Triple-A, he was for the first time hitting fewer than 50 percent fly balls, because he was hitting 28.7 percent line drives. He was still popping the ball up on 26.3 percent of his fly balls, which is a lot but is also a result of his strong uppercut swing which launches dingers. He hit 57 in 2021 and 2022 combined. By the time he gets to the big leagues, maybe this year if his shoulder recovers on schedule, he may well hurt with his batting average, he's not inclined to go the other way, but he should pull plenty of balls out of the park. He's patient and makes contact at a pretty good rate but also hits the ball pretty hard. He managed to hit 31 dingers last year on only 23 barrels. He led all of baseball in HR - xHR, which if it means anything is a bad leading indicator. His contact rate says his batting average should be around .265, which would help if he hits fewer homers. For now, he's a much better fit in OBP leagues than BA leagues, but still young enough that he may make some other adjustments that help.

He's missed a lot of developmental time to injuries, and has showed good strike zone judgment and a whole lot of swing and miss. Still, he's athletic, strong, a solid infielder, and fast as all get out. Can he learn better contact skills? Some do, but not many. Note that he had September surgery to repair a torn ligament in his thumb. He should be ready by Spring Training. Given his power and speed he could be a fantasy contributor with part time play in an AL Only if he makes the team. More likely he'll spend a good part of this year in Triple-A. ANGELS

Almost identical stat lines between 2022 and 2023, but the .050 decline in BABIP corresponds to a .048 point decline in batting average, a .059 decline in OBP, and a .023 decline in SLG. His season ended early in June with a torn labrum that was surgically repaired. He's a patient contact hitter who should have 20+ homer power if he gets more than 500 plate appearances. One note on that BABIP. While it is somewhat random it does respond to physical changes and for whatever reason, Pasquantino hit the ball softer last year and some of the BABIP loss can be attributed to that. But his xBA was .279, good enough not to scare you away.

He's youngish, so it wouldn't be fair to pass final judgment, but he was overwhelmed by big league pitching last year. Especially righties, though six of his seven homers came against them. So, let's say the jury is out. On a pitch level he was bested by fastballs and sliders but fared better against softer stuff, but given that he'd only seen 34 plate appearances above Double-A when he was called up in July he's clearly learning on the job. There's potential here, he's a 95th percentile speed guy who hits the ball fairly hard, just most often on the ground. Just don't overestimate the upside..

He compensated for an overly aggressive approach by becoming more selective and it worked, he walked more last year and struck out less. He also hit fewer balls hard and more on the ground, leading to a lot fewer homers. For the Astros his contribution to their offense ended up being about the same, but for fantasy owners he contributed about 25 percent less than the year before. That means he might be cheaper this year, with some chance of getting back to his slug-first ways.

A good enough fielder to get a good long look at shortstop somewhere, last year he bumped into Anthony Volpe and was edged aside in NY. He didn't hit nearly enough to make it a race, but showed enough at third base to get another shot at some point. He's shown some power in Triple-A but struggled with contact last year in the majors. Could he sneak past DJ LeMahieu? If LeMahieu shows enough decline in the field, why not? Otherwise Peraza could be a trade chit. Advanced quickly up the Yankees system once he got healthy in 2022, and last year spent time in Double-A, Triple-A, and with the big club from late August on. Minor league strikeout rates near 30 percent didn't stop him from hitting the ball often and hard in the minors, but he stumbled in the majors, striking out nearly 39 percent of the time. It's hard to see major league at bats for him now given the Yankees outfield, but lots could happen before opening day. He has little to prove in Triple-A and lots to prove in the majors.

According to Baseball Savant his expected homers in 2021, when he hit 48, was 51. Could he do that again? He hit the perfect storm that year with lots of playing time, lots of barrels, and lots of fly balls finding the stands. The last two years he's had fewer barrels and a lower rate leaving the yard as well as fewer at bats, so 2021 looks rather like an outlier in his career line. He is still hitting the ball hard and he's still not walking much, so we can't completely rule out stormy weather (of the good kind).

A classic utilityman, he earned extra playing time last year that it is unlikely he'll find this year unless there are injuries. He walks enough with defensive flexibility to warrant a bench job in the majors, but isn't likely to be much better than a fill-in in NL only leagues.

His price was depressed last year because he was coming off a poor season, was getting old, and there wasn't a clear path to playing time with the Mets, but he bounced back and after a trade and helped the Diamondbacks make the playoffs. Given his age it would be foolish to expect him to top last year's production, and the risk is that whatever ailed him in 2022 will bog him down again in the future, but with his bounceback in stolen bases and his solid skills the more he's discounted the more attractive he becomes.

The Mariners traded him to the Giants at the deadline, but after two games he strained his oblique and hit the IL. By the time he got healthy a month later the team released him. At his age such a catastrophic season, which started with a spring slump and never got going after that, might signal the end.

His price was depressed because he didn't sign until mid-March, but he's become a less powerful hitter who runs less in recent years. He might be cheap enough to roster in deep leagues, depending on where he signs, but he sure looks like he's in decline. A cheap price gives you room to hope for him to bounce back a little.

He's aggressive at the plate but has yet to show the contact skills that make that swing and run approach work, but he's quickly become a great centerfielder and the ability to cover ground and run balls down out there can offer time for him to improve his approach. The Red Sox have said they expect him to be in their outfield this year. That's where his youth helps, too, though that also might be a spur to sending him back to Triple-A to figure it out if he slumps. Another caution: He had 84th percentile sprint speed with the Red Sox last year, but across three levels was successful stealing 39 out of 53 times, or 74 percent of the time. That's not great, though his raw speed suggests it is improvable..

Classic slugger's profile and he catches! He swings hard and pulls the ball half the time but homers to both sides of the field because he's a pinch hitter. A lot of swing and miss, but so consistent in his first two years he must be picking his spots. He's improved his contact rate each of the last two years and his average has gone up. There's a limit to how far it can go but he's the real deal.

Was having a fine season as part of a platoon until August, when he jammed his knee. Struggled through the month, then collided with a staff member while shagging flies and ended up heading to the IL with a cervical sprain. He strikes out too much to trust, but has good power when he plays. Still, I'm wary of guys who breakout when they're 29.

Walked and struck out the same amount of times last year, the second year he's walked as much or more than he struck out. The other was 2018. You don't have to do that to be a good hitter, but if you can do that you are a good hitter. Last year's hitter to do it: Alex Bregman, Luis Arraez, Juan Soto, and Ramirez. Ramirez has hit more line drives than he did in his big power years. That seems to be a different approach, though I'm sure if he wanted to he could adjust back. The bigger problem is he sits in the middle of a weak lineup. The arrival of the Naylors and others may change that, but time is running out.

Spent last year at Double-A for the most part (he had 17 PA in Single-A) and walked in more than 11 percent of his plate appearances, which is not bad for a guy with a rep as unschooled. He's been pull heavy throughout the minors, but with an apparently improving approach and real power the Cuban import has a chance to be a force. Whether he is able to stick at third base will affect his fantasy value, but first he'll spend some time at Triple-A before possibly reaching the majors later this year. WHITE SOX

Nothing seems wrong, he just was off a little in a lot of little ways. No alarm bells here, he's still fast and can certainly hit, so consider 2023 an off year. But it's obviously a good idea not to expect catchers to thrive as the wear-and-tear of the job eats away at them over time. Realmuto's defensive value last year was, for the first time, not good, acording to Statcast. A warning?

He's only got three more years left on his contract with the Angels. He hasn't been a productive player since 2020, logging a total of 685 plate appearances the last three years. Might he get healthy and produce? His excellent eye has been there during these turbulent times, but he hasn't hit for power. Maybe if he slides over to DH he'll stay healthier, but it's worth remembering that since college health has been an issue for him, excepting those four glorious years in the center of his career. If he gets through Spring Training healthy his price will rise.

If he jacks a few more and hits closer to .250 than .230, which he should, he could earn the way he did in 2021 and 2022, but his skills showed some fade last year and his defense in right field right now is of dubious value. The Angels ditched him last summer because they hoped to save some money, and the Reds ditched him because he was hurt and they needed players, but he should have a long leash with the Royals.

He dramatically increased his walk rate last year, which increases his value in OBP leagues. The surprising pop he's shown the last two years isn't really enough to push him into mixed league value, but he was handy in AL-Only leagues qualifying nearly everywhere but first base and catcher. His season ended in early September with surgery to repair his biceps tendon. He is expected to be ready for Spring Training.

His season ended in August when he was diagnosed with post-concussion syndrome that traced back to a collision at first base with Fernando Tatis back in May. That very well might explain his very down season. At the time of the May injury he had 11 homers in two months but then just one more in the following two months before he was shut down. He said he was feeling fine at the end of the season, so the expectation is he'll be ready for spring training. That could be, but there are some who never really recover. Hope for a full recovery, but be prepared for ongoing issues.

He struggled against lefties in the majors last year while hitting righthanded, but did a fine job from the other side. It was only a small sample, and while his minor league splits weren't as extreme he was better against righties there as well. The good news is he's got excellent strike zone judgment and makes lots of contact, though again in his sporadic callups with Cleveland last year he struck out a lot. On the negative side, he's not a big power guy and has just a 50 percentile Sprint Score. With defensive flexibility and good bat to ball skills he could play a lot and be just a little helpful in mixed leagues.

March shoulder surgery spiked his season, but he was back on the field in July and ended the year on a hot streak, which should allay fears that he's damaged goods. Alas, he's a heavily Coor-aided hitter (.851 OPS there, .673 OPS on the road) with pedestrian power and no speed. His defense is solid enough to keep him in the lineup on a terrible team, which might make him an average NL-Only fantasy contributor, at most.

He's aggressive and has made plenty of contact in the minors thus far but only has 89 plate appearances in Triple-A so far. His second year in Double-A showed some erosion of skills, which portends potential trouble at higher levels, but he's still young enough to improve. WHITE SOX

Good defense should keep his power bat in the lineup even if he strikes out nearly 35 percent of his at bats, as he has so far in his major league career. He was down to 32.3 percent last year, so there's progress. But his batting average will hurt even if he improves some more.

The speedster's bat is lacking, that .300+ BA notwithstanding. Statcast xBA was .241. He had one barrel in 113 batted balls. But his defense in center will give him the edge in playing time, if he hits a little. There is the possibility he might not. Still, my brother, who works at the stadium in Reading, says he's a great guy, so I'm rooting for him.

What happened to him? The obvious answer is that he slumped last year, spent some time in the minors during the summer, and after being traded to the Mariners he was reborn. It could be, but the salient fact of his two big years is that he posted batting averages of .264 and .269 while his xBA based on his Statcast details were .232 and .239. In that context his xBA of .227 looks more similar than different. The possibiiity of a full-season rebound will elevate his price some, making him a risky bet that has some chance of paying off.

He's never hit enough homers or stolen enough bases to have real roto value, but for a few years his good contact skills consistently led him to hit for a decent average. In those years he could help a roto team, even though he made good roster construction harder. Last year he suffered with a somewhat weak BABIP and his batting average became hurtful. This year he's likely to be at most a weak-side platoon option and defensive substitute.

He's settled in as an effective strong-side platoonist, without the power he showed when younger but with enough to keep him in the lineup against righties. He did demonstrate last year that the eye problems that led to 2022 surgery were behind him, at least for the most part. But marginal platoonist offense from a left-fielder means future playing time will always be in jeopardy. Not someone to bid up.

So far he's no Juan Pierre though he runs like him. Pierre had contact rates topping 90 percent. He struck out less than seven percent of the time in all but one season. Ruiz makes contact a little more than 75 percent of the time and had an xBA of .235 last year. But man can he run. Note that all those steals came after he spent a month on the IL in midsummer with a dislocated shoulder, suffered while diving back into first base on a pickoff play. When he came back in August he ended up splitting time with the left-batting Lawrence Butler. Might he end up a platoonist? His .619 OPS against righties suggests he might, though he doesn't necessarily have to come up to bat to be in position to run..

His first full season got off with a bang, a terrific opening day, and finished hot, with mostly solid streaks in between. An excellent eye and good bat control are his secrets, and while they may limit his power upside he should get better at picking spots in which to go for it (though he had a 1.662 OPS on 3-0, a 1.024 on 3-1, and a 1.076 on 2-0, and his highest fly ball rates were on those three counts, so he's already going for it). On the downside he's shown a little weakness on breaking pitches, which might be exploitable going forward. For now he's among the best backstops in the game, with a chance to get better.

He hits the ball hard but isn't getting to that power because he hits so many balls on the ground. He's a career .559 OPS against lefties, so we're looking at a platoon player. His improved batting average last year was for real, but his best fantasy role would be as a power bat driving the ball over the fence. That hasn't happened so far, so don't pay too much for him in only leagues and maybe he'll surprise.

His revival was less a real revival and more the image of a man having better BABIP luck playing on more productive teams, plus six steals, the second highest of his career. Assume that's not going to happen again, and wonder how long he's going to keep pushing and how long someone will let him play. He's not that big a power hitter and his walks no longer make him an OBP plus. At his prices the last two years he's well worth a shot, that's pretty safe, but expecting him to repeat yet again courts disappointment.

Started being more selective a couple of years ago and became a better hitter. He's well-rounded, stole more bases last year than he had in his whole career before that, and will be under pressure for playing time as the Orioles get younger. But he should benefit from having a better lineup around him as long as he plays.

He walked more than he struck out in the majors, which is not a common thing, but then there aren't too many hitters who make the majors the year they're drafted. Schanuel did that last year, too. He was a first-rounder, 11th overall, so there is that. He did hit 19 homers for Florida Atlantic last year, so the utter lack of power he showed with the Angels may be his attempt to hit the ball first, then hit it hard. He had just a 25.6 percent hard hit rate, and his maximum Exit Velocity was 103.5. Only Tony Kemp, Zach Remillard, Jose Herrera, and Luis Guillorme hit their hardest ball more softly. There's no way you can rationally expect Schanuel to add power this year, but his batting eye is so good that at some point he's going to have to try. Until then his value is limited, but he may score a lot of runs.

He's got a nearly 14 percent career walk rate in his eight major league seasons and walked more than 17 percent of plate appearances last year. That helps him in OBP leagues because his career .225 batting average is a drag. He's hit 93 homers the last two years, ranking second in baseball behind only the AL season record holder. My formula dings him quite a bit for the bad batting averages, which can be managed if you build the right roster (or you play in an OBP league). Still, unlike Judge he's not injury-prone and he's unlikely to hit .280.

Got off to a good start when healthy, but then hurt his knee in late May and by August was sent down to the minors. Apart from his health struggles he's been passed by all the Reds' young talent so he's either going to be a utility guy or end up on another team when he's healthy. Tons of talent and potential, but seems to always be living in a world of limp. A lottery ticket in the endgame, in all likelihood.

Hamstring problems early in the season cost him plenty of playing time, and he had elbow surgery in October but is supposed to be ready for Spring Training. He's fast and has consistently posted above average BABIPs, which have led to decent batting averages and stolen bases. Maybe it was the hammy issues last year, but his Sprint Speed is declining. He did hit the ball harder than ever last year, and while he's weak against righties he could do some damage on the weak side of a platoon. That is enough for the Giants to re-sign him up for S4M this year.

His breakout came during the short 2020 pandemic season and he hasn''t hit the ball with so much authority since. He got plenty of playing time with the woeful Nationals last year and showed just how little he could do with it. It appears that what was promise is now disappointment. At least it's cheap disappointment.

Good strikezone judgment but bad defense and lots of weak contact limit him. He's a career .587 OPS hitter against lefties, .735 versus righties, which makes him a borderline platoon player as an outfielder who has little defensive value.

A catcher with his Triple-A numbers last year is exciting at first glance, but then the doubts quickly seep in. Hmm, Pacific Coast League. What's his MLE? It turns out it was 11 homers, 1 steal,, and a .198 batting average. Not so exciting. He's young, catchers often mature late, but they also wear down quickly sometimes. He's expected to become much more, but I find it hard to see that happening this year.

He's been a solid Triple-A hitter the last two years, but after promotion last summer he struggled. He was very aggressive and made a fair amount of contact but the hits did not fall. He has struggled against righty pitchers in the majors but that's a pretty small sample and he hit them just fine in Triple-A. An endgame play this year who could become a little something more.

He's a great hitter because he walks nearly 20 percent of the time, but all those walks reduce the number of his at-bats which reduces the influence his batting average has in those fantasy leagues that use BA. He set a career high of 12 in steals last year, which is nice, and pumps up his earnings. In OBP leagues he's a top player. In BA leagues he's a notch below.

He's not hitting as many homers (he hit the ball nearly as hard as usual, but not as many left the yard) and he set a career-best for stolen bases. Is this a new George Springer? He's discounted a little because of his age and chance that he will run less and continue to hit a more modest number of big flies.

The possibility of health problems doesn't mean that when he doesn't swing and miss he isn't one of the hardest hitters in the game. Only Acuna last year hit a ball harder. But he's also a statistical mess whose homers are offset by all the outs he makes. In the end, there will be homers, to the extent he plays, and he'll be bid up by teams that are chucking batting average.

Missed the first half of last year with a hip strain, then stayed home for the second half because the birth of a son was premature. The Angels included him in their deal with the Braves for David Fletcher as a salary dump, and the Braves moved him (paying some of that $7M salary) to the White Sox, who will pair him with Korey Lee, their No. 4 prospect. Stassi has been solid defensively, but apart from the short 2020 season he has struggled making contact, posting acceptable batting averages when his BABIP was above average. He has a little power and might be worth a dollar in an AL-Only league because of it, but has little upside in his profile.

His calling card was power, but while he showed more of it last year than in the past the balls just didn't leave the yard they way we were expecting them to. He's worth another shot because he plays catcher, but the numbers there are weak enough that maybe he shouldn't be. Don't over invest.

He's got good power versus righties, appears to be hopeless against lefties, and has plenty of swing and miss against everyone. He's signed with the Mets for this year as a strong-side platoonist. If he gets 400 at bats he could have a little deep league value because he won't cost much based on his history.

Expectations were for a late-season return and preseason bets on him seemed ready to pay off when he got back in early August. He was coming off Triple-A rehab with a 1.117 OPS, apparently hitting the ground running. Alas, he crashed like those Tik Toks of people trying to jump off a moving train. There have to be concerns after a disappointing 2022, his first in Boston, when he posted a career low OPS. Fears that he wouldn't be able to adjust after years of success in Colorado were warranted, but even if he's unable to produce as he did at altitude he should be, with health and a full season, a solid fantasy shortstop, hitting for power and stealing bases. Hope for Xander Bogaerts at this point, more than Francisco Lindor.

If he played all his games in Cincinnati, as he played half his games in 2019 when he hit 49 homers, Statcast estimates he would have hit 36 homers last year. So, Seattle hurts. If he played in Phoenix full time he would have had 25 homers last year, similar to the 26 he would have had full time in Seattle. For instance, he had 50 barrels in 2019 when he hit all those dingers and he had 50 barrels last summer when he didn't reach 20. In both years he had roughly the same number at home as on the road, so the makeup of the baseball matters, too. What also matters is that he struck out more than 31 percent of the time last year. When he came up he was more of a line-drive hitter, but since the big homer year his profile turns on the big fly, which is a disaster when it doesn't leave the yard. Will he get back to basics or will he continue to fly out and whiff? The former isn't impossible, but I wouldn't count on it. So, fly out and whiff is it.

An .875 OPS in the first half, .695 in the second. A good September kept the second half from looking even worse. A lot of the problem was lefties, against whom he had a .608 OPS and a nearly 20 percent infield fly ball rate. Expect a platoon, which might help the rates but hurt the quantities.

His first year in Chicago was as radically different in production as the earnings suggests. 2022's BABIP inflated batting average came back to last year's BABIP deflated average, and his RBI and Runs numbers went down because the Cubs offense was not the Braves offense. Finally, he didn't run nearly as much and was successful half as often. You could blame the heel injury that landed him on the IL in July, but he wasn't running before that either. His Sprint Speed was the same last year as in 2022, but he was on first base in 2022 about 20 more times than last year. That's not enough to be the difference. Of course, he didn't run that much in the years before 2022, so maybe it's that year that's the outlier. At least he'll be cheaper this year.

He wasn't really stinking it up when the Red Sox released him. He just wasn't that good, which based on what he did in Toronto his first year out of Colorado probably should have been expected. Milwaukee signed him because they needed an outfielder and he was terrible and then gone. Tampa similarly had some holes to fill late in the season and he had three hits in nine at bats (with two walks). Even a great defensive outfielder would have a hard time getting at bats with such a weak stick, and he's never been a great defender. A bounceback is unlikely.

Came back in late April after his PEDs suspension raking, but struggled in the second half to a .680 OPS. He did not hit the ball as hard as he has in the past, perhaps a vestige of the shoulder operations that cost him the 2022 season (along with the PEDs violation). We'll see. He did twist his ankle just after the All Star break, but only missed a few games then. He's still young with a load of potential but no longer qualifies at shortstop.

He's stilll fast but he ran less than he did in his first two ML seasons and showed more power. Solid defense should keep him on the field, but he struggled (.638 OPS) versus righties. That wasn't so much the case his first few years,

The first two months last year he hit 12 homers while playing mostly against lefties. At some point in June his forearm started to bother him and maybe that explains a month in which he hit .170 with zero homers. He was on the IL for nearly all of July and as he prepared to come off the IL he fractured a finger while shagging fly balls and went on to miss another few weeks. He was terrible after coming off the IL, but let's chalk that up to rust. He's now signed with the Pirates and will likely play first base and platoon. When healthy he's a solid power hitter against righties whose xBAs the past few years have been much higher than his actual BA, which is a slight reason to hope he could be surprising in Steel City.

Didn't show progress last year, and is so far a .455 OPS career hitter against lefties. But it isn't like his .683 OPS against righties is going to carry him. That's going to be his defense. He's young enough to figure out the next step, but hasn't shown yet that he can take it.

He's really fast, which helped him in 2022, but when the hits aren't dropping he makes a lot of outs. But as long as he's on a major league roster he'll be stealing bases. Alas, the Yankees dropped him from their 40-man in January.

Excellent strike zone judgment and big power, but his vulnerability low in the zone hurts. Is the issue mental or physical? He's had the same problems since graduating from High-A so he may just turn out to be a low-batting-average decent on-base guy, which is surprising for a guy with such a sweet looking swing. Or he may adapt, he's still young, and become a power superstar. Note that he came on in the second half, with an .816 OPS versus .709 in the first half.

He made better contact last year and it showed in the results, with his best xBA ever. His Sprint Speed is now down to the 27th percentile, a warning that he's likely not to run as much, and he's shown that with the move over to second base that his defense is never going to be the reason he's on the field. He's not going to be put out to pasture, at least not yet, but you have to wonder if he's the best fit for a team that wants to contend.

He performed pretty much as expected except that the strikeouts soared. His problem was the breaking ball, or rather all of the breaking balls, and unless he figures that out he's going to see more and more of them. That's where his lack of discipline is going to hurt him. He's young and has time to figure out a way to address this problem, which could lead to big profits. The risk that he doesn't and flails at the plate is the reason you shouldn't pay up for him.

When he's not hurt he's a power guy with good plate discipline and an increaing amount of swing and miss. He was earning at about a $25 pace when he went down last year. That's in line with where he ended up after his injury in 2022. Seems fair, but maybe ding him too for anticipated future injuries.

He was solid in Triple-A in 2022 and got off to a good start last year and so he was promoted to Milwaukee. He stole a lot but didn't sting the ball and so lacked luster overall. Plus he struggled against lefties. He'll get a chance to grow into things because of his defense, but if he ends up platooning or continues to struggle against lefties his value will be limited even if he hits the ball harder.

At the end of the year, after lots of discussing what was wrong with Turner, it looks like his batting average was most of the problem. He ran as much as he has the past few years, but that was less valuable in the context of increased steals in baseball overall. Curiously, Turner struggled against fastballs his first year in Philadelphia. Throughout his career his xBA has trailed his actual BA by a lot, until last year when the two were the same. I think the lesson might be we're unlikely to see those .325+ batting averages again and should prepare for him to hit in the .275 range unless he has better or worse luck.

Started last season with a hamstring strain and was finally activated in June. He did not hit much and when he did hit it was with less power than he's showed in the past. Vestiges of the injury and lack of training? We'll find out this year when he returns. He's just 27 years old, with enough youth to fix the things that went wrong. That's hardly guaranteed, and he's not ever been a contact hitter, but with enough power he could be a contributor.

Good contact means he's likely to have a good batting average, but not a whole lot of power and no speed. That profile can be profitable in roto terms, but fantasy players should not invest heavily to buy in. He's recovered from his June fractured pelvis last year, which ended his season prematurely.

He started last season as the Dodgers second baseman and one of the team's top prospects, but he never got it going in the majors and was sent down for more seasoning. His PCL inflated line looks a lot better than his major league one, but it is just moderately so. This year he lacks a position and will be challenged to show he can hit enough to play around the diamond the way Chris Taylor does. With an option left his major league pickin's may be slim.

For the second year in a row the homers and steals came, but the production and batting average did not. That's nearly 1200 plate appearances of weak batting average, despite his decent contact skills. It's hard to bet against such consistency, but I still think he's going to end up more of a .250 hitter than a .225 one, and Toronto's offense is going to click better than it did last year. So I'm not giving up on him, just taking whatever discount I can get, while acknowledging that his hitting skill set was a lot more attractive behind the plate than in the outfield.

The 2019 No. 3 overall pick was projected as a hit machine who had vast potential power, but he's so far combined aggressiveness with a lot of ground balls, limiting his on-base ability, creating a lot of outs, and bopping a modest amount of homers. It would not take a huge adjustment for him to up his game, though not all can do it and so far he hasn't, but even without that the volume of at bats he's gotten has led to some fantasy value. That means if he isn't undermined by his weak defense that he's a fairy safe bet to earn in the mid-teens and might have some upside.

I saw him in Arizona in 2022 and was impressed by his athleticism and his speed, but those can be misleading. He also has a good eye and showed improved contact skills last year before he injured his left wrist and his season ended with surgery last summer. The tools are there for a slash-and-run approach on good counts and an attack for power approach on great ones, but he wasn't able to make that work before he went down. Expect that 2024 will be a year we'll see if he's able to make enough improvements to become a major leaguer.

He pounded the ball to the tune of 21.4 percent barrels, and as a result his xBA was a robust (for his contact rate of 67 percent) .256. He can keep that up if he continues to hit 32 percent of his fly balls for home runs, but not many do. Aaron Judge does, but Velazquez is not Aaron Judge. His value will be very dependent on how long he can stay in the lineup when he's hitting .222. Every homer will help.

He's been as constant as the Northern Star, to allude to Joni Mitchell, constantly in the darkness but a little unlucky with the batting average last year. And didn't otherwise change in the face of a boost in offense overall, hence the earnings drop. All his homers were to right field last year, but Fenway's dimension in right center and down the line are a little shorter than Yankee Stadium's "short porch," so he won't be helped that way.

Mets fans howled last summer as the floundering team gave at bats to Dan Vogelberg instead of Vientos, but Vientos eventual did play semi-regularly and did not distinguish himself. He showed a bit of his power, but after making much better contact in Triple-A last year than in 2022, he struck out better than 30 percent of the time in the majors and his walk rate collapsed. He only has 274 major league plate appearances, but with a .609 OPS during that time his ability to get enough at bats to bring his pwoer game has to be doubted. How much is going to affect his price, but the risk that the doubts are justified mean he might still be overpaid.

Last year Mets fans wondered loudly why the team was giving meaningless at bats to Vogelbach rather than handing the baton to Mark Vientos. It's the sort of question that usually isn't answered directly, but in the post-season the Mets cut Vogelbach's bait (or however that expression goes) and they seem ready to count on Vientos this year. But the better point is that Vogelbach was a much better player last year and figures to be better again this year, but he's the sort of unexciting platoon bat who has real value in the right role. A role that isn't really fantasy friendly, though more so in OBP leagues. Which is why you don't want to pay too much for him in only leagues, and at best stream him for a week here or there.

Has work to do hitting the breaking ball and off-speed stuff, but the power and speed he showed his rookie season and his Gold Glove fielding made him a bright spot in a miserable Yankees season. Figure that he's going to be bid up aggressively if you have Yankees fans in your league. I'd be cautious because it will take big changes for him to reward that aggressiveness.

He's been horrible over his career against lefties but better last year. His main skill is taking a walk and he does barrel the ball regularly. Defensive value is nil and offense against righties is fine if he gets the playing time. Given other choices at any time he may not.

He stole more than two bases in a season in 2019. A late-bloomer, he has now established himself as a solid major league hitter. How long will that last? Late bloomers often fade earlier than others, but not always. The steals may or may not come again this year, but there is no reason to think the power fades now.

Terrific potential as a slugger, but defensive woes and a slump landed him back in Triple-A for the month of May. Probably as much a reflection of the Cards overloaded outfield as of his performance. He's young and should get better in right field, but if he doesn't there's always DH.

He'll work the count and draw some walks, but he strikes out a lot for a guy with little power. Last year's stolen bases were a nice plus, but this switch hitter is weak from both sides of the plate and mostly out there because of his glove, which according to the metrics hasn't been all that good. Endgame filler in the deepest leagues.

A hot start his rookie year, in 2021, raised expectations, but there was a lot of swing and miss in his game even then, and much more last year. He spent time early in last season on the IL because of migraines and insomnia, so there is some chance his terrible season was partly caused by those issues. But he has a lot to prove before he ends up with a full time job again.

His season ended in early August when a pitch to the head led to surgery to fix his left orbital bone and his nose. Expectations were high coming off a strong 2022 season, but he struggled last year against righties as he had in 2021 (and had not in 2022). There is risk that the beaning will cause lingering psychological effects but even if he is fine he's a player moving into the start of the late phase of his career with only one season of value under his belt. A return to that form isn't impossible.

Good contact skills and a little power are more his claim to the majors than his defensive tools, which seem to be just fine. His batting average last year in limited play was depressed, but his xBA of .275 much better reflects his skills. It's always possible to get ahead of young catchers, who have a lot of things other than hitting to worry about as they adjust to the majors, but it's good to latch on to those who look like they can really hit.

He can play shortstop and thrice in the Tampa years he got on base enough (and played enough) to have value, but career-low walk rates in Miami the last two years, and a nearly career-high strikeout rate last year, suggest to me he isn't going bounce back with the bat.

He hit enough (8 homers) in the COVID year of 2020 to win a Gold Glove at first base, as a rookie, but injuries since then have made him a forgotten man. Not by Jerry DiPoto, who rues the six-year contract he gave White in 2019. He's coming back from hip surgery last May, and maybe that will solve his problems and get him back on the field in 2024. Now with the Braves, who traded for him in the Jarred Kelenic deal, but the Angels, to who he was traded in the David Fletcher deal. There's still potential, I think, but it's wise to remember that in 306 major league plate appearances so far he's got a .544 OPS. He should be better than that if he is healthy, but a return to the majors is not a slam dunk.

Surprisingly made the Brewers out of camp and played regularly in the first half, but he struggled with breaking pitches and before a September demotion he was sitting against right-handers. He ended up with a .568 OPS against righties, which isn't going to play, though he walked against them more than 10 percent of his plate appearances (which seems like useful accomodation). He's got a good power and speed combo and would have some value on the weak side of the platoon, but the reason you might want to roster him is if he can start to hit righties. He did it in the minors.

Back spasms, a quad injury, a bum neck, tightness in his oblique, and an illness that knocked him out of the lineup early in the season were just a few of his problems last year. Another was that he was platooned, though that's how it probably should be. He made the weakest contact of his career last year and struck out more than ever before. With claims around the game that he doesn't work hard enough and is a bad teammate, wherever he lands this winter is going to be looked at closely. Winker said he let things from his personal life affect his performance, and he vowed to reform, so there are a broad range of potential outcomes this season. In such circumstances, cheaper is better. Reform is hard.

When Lars Nootbaar got hurt last August the Cardinals moved Tommy Edman to center and brought the hot-hitting shortstop prospect up from Memphis. Winn was the team's No. 2 prospect, ranked No. 37 overall by Fangraphs, where he is projected for the majors in 2025. That timetable has accelerated because of what he showed last year. However, the results were not good in the majors, so his Opening Day status has to be in doubt. When he gets back to the bigs look for a contact-first approach with solid defense and a little pop and speed. Scouting reports are that he's a strong athlete in a smaller body, limiting his power projection, but he's been advancing through the minors as one of the youngest players at each level (as he was in the majors last year). When he finally gets the call expect a solid contributor even if he's unlikely to be an explosive performer.

A quick start last year had the prodigious strikeout master generating real value, but things fell apart after that and after May he spent a lot of time riding the pine. He did miss time in June with a wrist sprain, so it's possible that affected him the rest of the way. You hope so, because the Cubs signed him to a major league contract this year, suggesting he'll work as a utility-platoonist. He's got big power but also a career 37-percent strikeout rate.

Something went hideously wrong in Seattle last year, as he had a .468 OPS in 216 plate appearances. He signed with the Dodgers and had two homers and two stolen bases in 34 plate appearances, but he's never hit the ball more softly. In recent years he's been a fairly reliable source of some homers and some steals with a decent batting average, valued for his consistency. He'll cost a whole lot less based on last year's collapse.

He's 6'6 and 240 pounds, not a little guy, but he hit 26 homers and stole 18 bases last year split between High-A and Double-A (with about twice as many plate appearances in Double-A). He struck out nearly 34 percent of the time in Double-A, which may well be an issue for him going forward, but his power is vast and he's likely only going to get stronger as he matures. Still, given his age and contact issues it is unlikely we're going to see much of him in the majors this year. NATIONALS

His aggressive approach hasn't done him any favors. Curiously, he was effective against heat in 2022 and weak against offspeed stuff, but in 2023 he struggled with the fastball and mashed the slower deliveries. Whether that was the result of an effort to change or there was some other reason, his power waned last year. He'll try to land a spot as backup outfielder this year.

Bat first middle infielders have to hit, and Yorke can do that. Double digit homers and steals with a better than 10 percent walk rate in Double-A is going to get him to Triple-A this year. How he slots into the future with the Red Sox will determine how quickly he advances. Guys without plus defensive skills or big power often end up in a utility role and are challenged finding enough fantasy relevant at bats. He's probably not a factor in 2024 unless injuries force the issue. RED SOX

My projection last year was 16 homers, 4 steals, .277/.351/.425. He's a good aggressive hitter with line drive power to all fields who hit a lot of ground balls last year. There is more home run potential if he gets more loft, but he is already a solid and proven major league hitter.

Marched up from Single-A+ to Double-A to a week in Triple-A to the majors last season. He's speedy with decent strike zone judgment and bat to ball skills. Hit a lot of grounders last year, no barrels, but he swings hard enough to drive the ball if he can actually do that. But for our purposes the whole game right now is his speed, which is of the first rank. Come for the steals and maybe find a pretty decent batting average.

Didn't play much for the Diamondbacks after they signed him after the White Sox released him, but he was part of the deal that got them Eugenio Suarez, the deft defensive third baseman who has shown above average power in the past. Zavala is strictly a defensive plus, who has a little power but woeful contact skills. Presumably he'll back up Cal Raleigh until Harry Ford is ready, maybe in 2025.

Released last June by the Guardians, he took the rest of the summer off. Going into last season he was recovering from thoracic outlet syndrome surgery, so maybe that contributed to his weak bat before the release. Suffice it to say he has a career average below the Mendoza Line, but hit 33 homers in 2021, the year before he was injured.

A nice series of starts for the 2021 second-round pick after he was called up in June, but by August the magic was gone and things only got worse in September, when he had a .914 OPS against in 20.7 innings. Right now he has a solid fastball/slider combination, and a curveball that was pounded. He had some success with his change last year so there is some hope for improvement as he gains big league experience, but given his ballpark is bad for flies and he gave up a lot of them you have to be very concerned about that second-half collapse.

His second straight very effective season as a setup guy. The earnings jump last year was because of a drop in BABIP and an increase in his LOB%, plus a few more saves. His season ended in September with shoulder inflammation, capping a modestly successful rookie season. He doesn't throw that hard and relied on his splitter, which works as a kind of change up, to keep hitters off balance. He's also shown a tendency to walk hitters at the higher levels and shouldn't be totally trusted this year, but he gets enough swings and misses to suggest some chance of breaking out, too.

He did two stints on the IL of more than a month each with elbow inflammation, but when he was active (mostly in April, June, and September) he was very effective. That led to a personal high in saves and his lowest BB/9 since his rookie season back in 2017. Even if he doesn't enter the season as closer, and he might, that makes him a valued arm out of the pen, especially in holds leagues.

After working primarily as a starter in 2021 and missing most of 2022 with injuries, AA started last season in the bullpen, considered a possible part of a closer by committee consisting of a few unproven arms. But by June he was the Cubs go-to guy, at least until his season ended in September with a forearm strain. He throws hard and while he doesn't have elite strikeout numbers he does a good job keeping the ball on the ground and avoiding hard contact. Enters

His stellar 2022 season built off terrific control, but he struggled with that last season and the result was very much worse. That the good season was with the bravura Dodgers and the bad with the hapless Angels doesn't mean anything, right? He would be suspect for fantasy purposes, a streamer at best, if he was walking 1.71 per 9, as he did in 2022. That he might walk 4+ per 9 again, as he did last year, makes him a $1 or reserve play hoping he can recapture part of the magic.

April 2023 shoulder surgery had him down most of the season, but he was able to make seven rehab appearances in the minors. He doesn't throw hard, but he's got tough breaking pitches and a fine change up. In 2022 he was allowed to go five or more innings only eight times and was pulled in the fourth nine times, to fantasy owner's frustration everywhere. Maybe with health and maturity he'll be babied less, but now is not the time to bet that this is the year.

He's worked as a starter the last two years and had his ups and downs. He throws hard but is pretty much all cutter-slider. First time through the order he has a 3.13 ERA, second time it drops to 4.85, and the third time it's 6.45. He's in the Reds rotation this year, but he won't have a long leash if he stumbles.

Bounced up and down early in the season while mostly working in relief when he was in the majors, but when Marcus Stroman was hurt in August he made nine starts before Stroman returned. Whether working as a starter or multi-inning reliever, Assad was effective but not dominating and put up a much stronger ERA than his xERA (4.61). He hasn't shown strikeout punch in the majors so far but his sinker/cutter/slider heavy repertoire has helped him keep the ball on the ground. Whether he's a starter or a reliever he's unlikely to have mixed fantasy league appeal.

His control has never been good, and he was out of baseball for six years because he had the yips, but a 8.57 per 9 walk rate is a lot. It's the seventh worst for pitchers with more than 40 IP since 1961, per BR.com's Stathead. He's signed for another year and could presumably once again regain his control and close for Colorado, or he could retire or be released. Hope for the best, but pay for the least.

Struggled with Kansas City in the first half of the season working as the Royals closer, but after a trade to San Diego and a transition to setup man he was more effective but still walked too many. He was traded to the Guardians in November and should work as a setup to Emmanuel Clase with some closer-in-waiting potential.

Last year the 200 innings he threw meant he was a strikeout help even without elite strikeout rates. He's got a broad arsenal but his bread and butter is control and the ability to keep hitters off balance, making his fastball his best weapon. The last four years he's established himself as a reliable starter, but its best not to get too comfortable expecting similar results. Just a little bad luck could knock things out of balance.

With his legal situation resolved he signed in the NPB last year and was once again successful, going 10-4 with a 2.76 ERA, walking 31 and striking out 130 in 130.7 innings. There has been a little speculation about him signing back in the states but that is far from certain. If it happens expect to pony up big bucks to buy into what will surely be a circus.

He's a terrific dart throw if he's cheap, but if someone in your league likes a talented Rays pitcher who has shown terrific speed, dominance, and control in his nine career major league starts before TJ, you shouldn't chase him. For one, he's likely to be rusty and may show the control issues many pitchers do as they learn to pitch after TJ. For another, he's sure to be innings limited. On many teams that limitation might lead to four-inning stints with no chance at the win, but the Rays could have him follow an opener, making it conceivable he'd have Yarmouth-ian season. But we don't know. I'm going to push him a little, but if someone pushes back I'll back off.

His strikeout rate fell, though he was throwing with the same heat, but his infield fly rate soared, which makes it something of a wash. He relied more on his excellent heater and less on his curve and you can't argue against the results. He allowed a surprisingly low number of line drives and home runs per fly ball, both tend to regress toward the middle, so don't expect quite as much smooth sailing this year, but he should be as safe a source of saves as any.

He struck out many minor leaguers coming up, but in his first season with the Red Sox he worked to induce ground balls and induce he did. His fantasy value is muted because of that, the strikeouts are not likely to be many, but with good control and lots of grounders he has a good chance to be better than he was last year.

Cleveland seems to produce an endless stream of overachieving hurlers, and Bibee last year joined the skein. Credit him with terrific control, which always helps, and enough strikeout punch to help if not dominate, but his left on base and home run per fly ball metrics point to coming turbulence. He leans toward allowing fly balls and they didn't leave the yard last year the way you would expect. When they do his overall numbers are likely to get worse. Plenty of Cleveland pitchers have in the past resisted what looked like an obvious fall, so don't write Blbee off completely. He throws hard enough and has a tough slider to get guys out a lot of the time, but not all the time.

His season almost ended in early July, when he hit the IL with elbow inflammation, but he made it back in September and made two regular season starts, striking out 12 and walking one in 11 innings. He's been a top starter in recent years, though in 2021 a mid-season shoulder issue cut his season short. Since his return from that injury his K% has dropped from 30+ percent each season to last year's 20.1 percent, a radical decline. He's still been an effective starter but much less dominating. Despite his ace-like 2022 ERA and WHIP, expectations should be tempered. Even at his best he's been subject to hard contact, a quality that's harder to counter when the strikeouts don't come.

Juiced his strikeout rate last year but the walk rate went up with it. He also allowed a lot of hits, which led to a fair number of runs and a bad WHIP. And pitching for a bad team doesn't usually lead to wins, and didn't for Blackburn. The main thing for Blackburn, whose 2022 season ended with a finger injury and whose 2023 season started late because of another finger injury, is he stayed healthy once he got going.

The Cubs released him last May and he soon signed on with the Pirates, for whom he pitched very well the rest of the summer. He threw a ton of ground balls and walked only four in 40 innings working in a middle/setup role. He doesn't strike out enough hitters for more than replacement value in deep leagues.

He's been a closer and was bid up to $3 last spring in hopes that he'd end up closing games for the Cubs, but the smart money didn't bid and he instead ended up battling forearm issues that causes him to be out from May 14 to September 11. The questions about his control and command seems to be answered. And the answer is yes. It's probably unwise to expect more of that mini-ERA however. His xERA of 3.82 better reflects his strikeout ability and tendency to induce ground balls and get outs so far. That makes him a solid No. 2 or 3 starter, not an ace.

He looks like he should be an ace, but he was just too hittable last year to dominate the way it looks like he would. This could just be a lack of seasoning. He has yet to dominate in Triple-A, much less the majors, and has struggled to keep the ball in the yard. He has the talent and stuff to be a top starter, but should be available on the cheap because he has yet to show he can do it.

A reliever with four saves and nine wins who strikes out 13.63 per 9 innings should be worth more than $5, but Brash allowed a BABIP of .380 last year, which coupled with a 3.69 per 9 walk rate gave him a hurtful 1.33 WHIP. He allowed a .352 BABIP in 2022, which could be bad luck or an indictment of the Mariners defense. The metrics praise Seattle's defense, so maybe Brash will shock us when his luck evens out (assuming it does at some point). He's next in line for saves if Andres Munoz has difficulty.

He's not particularly dominating but he throws hard and benefited last year inducing a lot of infield flies and few homers. He's had a solid career as a part-time setup guy, not earning enough holds to really help in leagues that count them, and there no reason not to expect more of the same.

Was something of a surprise making the Yankee staff out of Spring Training last year, but after two decent starts he struggled. He did two stints in Triple-A after that but when he was recalled in August he was excellent in two and three-inning relief assignments. The Padres need starters so they may give him another try, which won't necessarily be a mistake, but he'll need to do something different to succeed.

Former phenom got bit last year by allowing a lot of homers on fly balls and a lot of the runners he left on base coming around to score. That's how you end up with a 5.09 ERA while not having pitched too badly. He obviously needs to pitch more effectively to be worth rostering, but the potential for a breakout with a little better luck and a little better control is great.

The Braves were not scared off by that 6.79 ERA last year and neither should you.High BABIPs reflect the White Sox poor infield defense and bad luck, while the high rate at which runners he stranded scored hurt as well. He's a solid setup guy who throws a goodly number of strikeouts. The jump in his walk rate last year is a concern but combined with the increase in strikeouts it suggests a trade off, which perhaps can be adjusted to fit his situation. Maybe.

His excellent 2022 season was more of a fluke than his campaign last year, when he was way more hittable. He'll get some chances for wins pitching the middle innings ahead of the Rangers offense, but is a risky qualitative play.

He velocity was down a little last year and he threw quite a few fewer strikeouts, though he threw enough innings that he was still elite in a way. He threw enough walks that only a low BABIP kept his WHIP from bouncing up by a lot (as it were it was his highest since 2019). It has now been two years in a row his component indicators have worsened, which doesn't mean they will continue to, but it is doubtful they'll bounce back (and they could decline more).

He's still in the ace category, but more toward the bottom than the top these days.

He's got two problems. His control is bad, so he walks too many hitters, and he struggles against righties. Or at least has, so far. The upside possibility is that he gains better control and figures out how to get righties out enough to be effective overall. The downside possibility is that the Marlins are going to look at how effective he was in relief late last season and make the project turning him into a top reliever. There's a lot of potential either way, and for now that uncertainty may make him a fair risk. By draft day we'll know more.

Missed all of 2022 with a back injury, then started last season on the IL with a groin strain, and spent two weeks on the IL in August with calf tightness. When he was on the mound he showed good control of his excellent change up and a blasted tendency to give up home runs. He's not going to cost much and should be a sneaky sleeper pick, especially if he can be streamed to avoid power teams.

Came out of nowhere (16 walks in 18 innings pitched in the majors in 2022) last year to dominate with exquisite control rather than overwhelming power. He shared the closer role after Felix Bautista was hurt and didn't pitch particularly effectively that last month of the season. He doesn't have the strikeout chops a traditional closer usually has, going after the ground out more often than not. He put the control issues behind him last year but for him to be worth chasing he's going to have to land the closer job this year. The signing of Craig Kimbrel probably means not, and even if he ends up in the role he may not hold it. Consider his price very fluid until more is known.

He'd been kind of holding his own in recent years, despite the injuries and the fact that he doesn't have the stuff he had in his heyday. But last April he hit the IL with elbow pain caused by some loose stuff and spent a month getting fit. After that he never found his groove, though he was successful enough at times for stubborn owners (moi!) to keep him active when they clearly shouldn't have. We can write that disaster of a season off to the elbow issues, but given his age and his history he's best monitored closely this Spring.

After years dodging dingers in Cincinnati he succumbed in Seattle, allowing far more homers in Seattle than he ever had before. He threw a lot more fastballs last year, rather than the changes that were his featured pitch before, perhaps luxuriating in an environment that wasn't designed to mess with pitchers' heads. Superior control and a strikeout punch, plus his previous ability to win with the change up, suggest there might be better if he needs it, but be wary in case he doesn't.

The massive decline from 2022 was much more of the same, but just a little worse in every possible way. He walked a little more, struck out a little less, he allowed a few more homers. His BABIP allowed increased significantly while his LOB% decreased, both measures of bad luck. But hitters did hit the ball harder and they hit line drives, which are more indicators of ineffectiveness. Perhaps most significantly, he lost one mph off his fastball, slider, and curve, each of which was decidedly less effective than in 2022. He also lost three miles off his change up, which was his best pitch. Cease's problem coming up was his control and he's still struggling with it, which influences all of his pitches. I'm going to attribute some of last year's decline to the Chicago defense, which was probably baseball's worst, some to bad luck, and some to problems with the potential to be ongoing. He's still attractive because of the strikeouts, but somewhat less so because it looks like 2022 might have been his peak.

The perils of the PCL appear in Cecconi's Triple-A line last year. Many runs allowed despite the a very nice K/9 and BB/9 combo. Too many homers in that league's bandboxes made the numbers look worse than he deserved. He had trouble missing bats in the majors, but his fine control will give him a chance to make the rotation in camp this year.

Veteran setup guy missed three months last summer with a fractured shin, but continued to be an effective contributor out of the pen. He doesn't throw hard but keeps the ball down and hitters off balance with a cutter-sinker-change combination. He's old but it has been working for him.

He was not a top prospect when he came up, but when he's been healthy since then he's been an effective innings eater for the Guardians. With his trade to the Rays last summer his strikeout rate immediately jumped and his walk rate held steady, but he ran into bad BABIP and left on base luck and his old bugaboo, the long fly, bit him. His up and down success-and-struggle pattern should keep his price cheap, which makes him a possible cheap play in deep mixed leagues, but of course it isn't a sure thing he'll be a positive.

Led the majors in saves and blown saves last year, which can't be an easy thing to do. Also had the biggest percentage of team saves. He was much less efficient last year, throwing 200 more pitches to get the same number of outs, even though his strikeout rate dropped by seven percent. The issue wasn't velocity but a much less robust drop on his slider. He's the man in Cleveland, for now, but his hold on the job can't be considered as secure now that the results are less dominant.

Hit the IL in May with wrist inflammation and in June/July for more than a month with biceps inflammation, but until a couple of blowouts in September he'd pitched effectively. He's not the power pitcher he once was and his tendency to throw fly balls might be tested in the wrong home park, but he should be a fairly safe back of the rotation arm or a streaming option in most leagues.

Struggled with his curve ball last year and didn't strike out nearly as many as he had the year before. The Giants picked up his option for this year, so he should get a chance to make another 28 starts, as he has the last two years. But the elevated expectations for him that arose last year should be dampened. He's a useful major league starter for the Giants, and an older arm without much upside for his fantasy teams.

He's seen a velocity and control decline the last few years, and struggled last year even after demotion to Triple-A. So far he's just been too hittable,, which is not a good look. He might fix things, or he might be moved to the bullpen, but for now he doesn't look like a fantasy contributor this year.

Everybody knew he wasn't repeating his terrific 2022 season, but as lucky as he was that year he was unlucky last year. That's before he was laid low in June with a strained labrum. He made one start in August and then went back on the IL with the same issue. In December he began a throwing program with a goal of getting ready for Spring Training. He's not a dominating arm but his guile and control have had good results when he's been able to keep the ball in the park. That was 2022 and none of the rest of his time in the majors. Injury and bust risk are elevated, take care.

He earned a save the last week of the season, but he isn't closer material. After putting up big strikeout numbers and struggling with control in Triple-A in 2022, he pitched more to contact and reduced the free passes. Coupled with a super high left on base percentage, a miniscule number of homers per fly, and a low BABIP allowed, he posted a fantasy friendly ERA and WHIP. Don't expect more of the same this year.

He's been knocking around the majors since 2014, doing a decent job as a middle guy but rarely entrusted with high-leverage situations. That changed last year. And last year he posted his best numbers ever. That made him a little valuable in holds leagues and an okay fill-in in AL only leagues. Over the years his skills have bounced around all over the place, so there's no guarantee that he'll repeat, which makes him a tough sell on auction day.

Made the team as a starter filling in for injured guys, but ended up taking regular turns as the season progressed. He's been hit or miss so far, particularly effective when all the fly balls he throws don't leave the yard. That went better in the second half, when he had a 3.52 FIP and 7.4 percent of his fly balls were homers. There's no way to know whether that's going to stick this year, but there is nice breakout potential here if it does.

An all around poor year ended in late August when he was put on the IL because of bone spurs in his elbow. He has been rehabbing under his doctor's advice to avoid surgery, but there is a real chance he's not going to be able to pitch come Spring Training. Note that there is also the real chance he'll be just fine. Given his age and injury history it's probably best to be conservative here, the projected 170 innings is probably at the high end of the range, even if he looks good during camp.

The Padres traded for him last November and he slots into the 8th inning setup role at this point, though the Padres added two Asian relievers, which might push him back to the 7th inning. He did a decent job for the Guardians last year but doesn't look like closer material, in part because of the decline in his K rate. Depending on what role he ends up in he could have draft day value.

In the six starts he made last year he was brilliant, but then he broke down again. If you combine the 11 starts he made to finish 2022 with the six he made to start 2023 you could say he went 17 starts without getting hurt. Before that, combine the 12 starts in the Covid short season with the 11 he made to start 2021 and you have almost another complete season in his career. He says he's healthy now and is working toward 2024. How much risk are you going to take on. I thought last year's $25 bid represented a 50/50 proposition that he'd make 16 starts or so. That didn't pan out, so how do we adjust the risk this year? I would bet that he'll make 10 starts and hope I get more. The fact is that there is no more domineering pitcher in the game, still, when he can take the bump.

A flexor strain in July ended his season but the hope is that he'll be ready by the time camps open. After a disastrous 2022 season due to a bum ankle expectations were low, and alas he met them. His 2021 career year was a little tinged with luck, but is a model for what a healthy DeSclafani can do. He'll be cheap again and if healthy he's a worthy endgame target.

Threw more breaking pitchers last year and fewer fastballs and changeups, got better results on the breaking stuff, threw more strikeouts, and still had a down season. Because he already has a perfect game it's easy to forget he's just 25 this year. With last year's velocity increase and a developing mix of pitches there is the potential for more. He has season-long breakout potential.

Relied more on his slider to get outs last summer, but was still a high-strikeout high-walk closer with control of the job when all is said and done. As long as he remains so hard to hit no one is going to worry about the walks, but that inflection point is going to see him either get even better or eventually fall apart. Solid because he throws strikeouts, but still a risky proposition.

Reportedly fully recovered after last spring's surgery to repair his patella, injured celebrating during the World Baseball Classic, which cost him all of last season. He should pick up where he left off, as one of the game's best closers. His lower bid price for 2023 is a mix of those who paid full price before they knew of his injury and those who bid nothing after his injury.

In 2022, Dodd advanced from High-A to Double-A showing great control and a strikeout punch. Last year, in Triple-A he struck out fewer and walked more, while allowing more home runs, despite a 44-percent ground ball rate. He also made seven big league spot starts spread across the schedule and notably didn't miss bats. Of all pitchers with 30 or more innings he had the lowest strikeout rate, though he ranked 60th in lowest swinging strike rate, maybe a sign that next time he'll do better. He's likely to start the year in Triple-A and get more seasoning.

He pitched better last year in every way except as measured by ERA, thanks to a little bad BABIP and LOB% luck. He did get better results with his sinker and lesser results with his slider, the opposite of 2022, but whatever. Expect more of the same, one way or the other, going forward.

There weren't many teams that took a chance on Dunning last year. He low strikeout style and very mediocre results the year before no doubt convinced them that he wasn't worth it, but three strong months to start 2023 turned the conversation around and got the waiver wire humming. How long can he keep this up? It turns out three months was the limit, even though he boosted his second half strikeout rate to better than one per inning. He appears to be solid enough not to kill fantasy hopes, but not dominant enough to be worth playing in mixed leagues even when he's going good.

Threw the hardest fastball in the majors last season (101.8 mph) but takes a little off his split finger pitch (98.4 mph), looking like an archetypal closer. The Twins ended up in the bottom half of team saves last year and Duran earned 71 percent of those, which accounts for his fairly low count. He did blow five of them. Look for more of the same and expect he'll have a more established role this time around. Maybe that will make a difference.

Moved to a better park for pitchers and stayed healthy and made it look easy. His xERA of 3.11 was well below his career best 3.50, meaning he was probably even a little unlucky. The third pillar of his success was a second-lowest-in-baseball BB% rate. Can he stay healthy? Can he continue to throw ground balls? Can he keep people from walking? There is no evident reason to think he can't.

When pitchers with weak heat, like Elder, are going good, as he was the first half last year, we like to say that he's succeeding because he "knows how to pitch." Unfortunately, sometime around July 1st he forgot how to pitch and his season went off the rails. Still, he was so good those first three months, that he ended up with a positive value for the year. And he wasn't an unmitigated disaster in the second half, he did have six quality starts in his 15 starts while on his way to throwing his most innings ever. Did he stumble because hitters learned to lay off his devastating slider, drawing more walks while pulling the ball less? Or was he lucky with men left on base in the first half and the chickens later came home to roost? Most likely, yes and yes, meaning he's going to need to figure out other ways to get hitters out, and until he does his expected ERA will be closer to 4.50 than the career 3.66 he's put up so far.

He was brilliant for the most part the first two months last season, then struggled from June on while, typically for him, missing six weeks with forearm tightness from July to September. Fortunately for the Rangers he was once again brilliant in the postseason, going 5-0 with a 2.95 ERA. His durability issues are very real. He's topped 150 innings pitched once since 2016, but when he's healthy he can be very effective. The problem is that he may also be pitching with some kind of issue that undermines him. He can help any fantasy team, in spots but not always, so the cheaper he is the better.

He struggled with forearm and hip injuries in the first half but was strong in the second half, striking out 44 percent of the batters he faced. Injuries have held him back since he first reached the majors in 2019, so it's hard to trust he'll be as effective a closer for the full year this year as he was in the second half last year, but to the extent he can drag himself out to the mound expect lots of strikeouts and ground balls and a few more walks than you'd like. Plus saves.

Re-signed by the Reds, the veteran middle reliever earned a profit last year because of wins and saves, for the most part. He could very well pitch even better and end up with neither. Plus, he doesn't throw enough strikeouts to be a fill-in target when your fantasy staff is hurt. Yet, he could help the Reds.

The 2023 KBO MVP signed with the White Sox. The story is that after he was non-tendered by the Nationals after the 2022 season, he knew he needed to get his shoulder healthy and make over his mechanics. He sold his house, moved to Scottsdale, Arizona, and signed on with a pitching lab that worked with a physical therapy company. He also signed with KBO's NC Dinos. Fedde had a terrific year in South Korea in 2023, and the story that he has remade himself at a pitching lab is enticing, But context matters. Fedde's KBO numbers are much better than Merrill Kelly's were in South Korea a few years back, and maybe a little better than Miles Mikolas's were in NPB in 2017. Kelly and Mikolas have proven themselves upon their return to the States as major league hurlers, but neither has dominated. Expect the same from Fedde.

He was hit harder last year than in the past, so that high BABIP isn't all bad luck. As a pure two-pitch hurler with two-thirds his pitches 96 mph fastballs, guessing is somewhat easier. He should be a decent source for holds.

He's blown 16 saves in 66 chances the last three years, struck out just a tad more than eight per nine innings last year, and has always been vulnerable to the long ball. That makes him a cheap date but nothing special as a closer, which makes him vulnerable to replacement at any time. Which should make him even cheaper, unless he's the announced closer this spring.

He stayed healthy, so 2023 has to count as something of a win, but the results were not so good. The small number of innings after Baltimore traded for him look disastrous and landed him in the pen by season's end, but were mostly the product of seven homers allowed. Homers have always been his bugaboo when he's been healthy, but in Detroit he moves into the best homer-suppression park in the AL. That's a reason to take a small risk.

One of the worst pitchers in the major leagues last year, he has now signed with the White Sox, a team that is acting like it is going for the first draft pick. Flexen is an extreme pitch-to-contact pitcher who has cobbled together a few seasons as a swingman, striking out fewer than seven per 9 innings. He was less effective in Seattle than Colorado last year, but horrible in both. With better luck and control he did have some value in 2021, but that isn't a reason to sign up today.

He has advanced up through the Tigers system since signing as a free agent in 2020 out of Venezuela by way of a junior college in Arizona. He repeated Double-A last year after success there in 2022, and that makes me wonder what the Tigers know. He will apparently advance this year to Triple-A and maybe beyond, though he got hit a bit in the Arizona Fall League. Small sample and he did strike out 22 in 18 innings while walking four. There is some chance he'll be successful in the majors this year, but lots of reasons not to bet big. TIGERS

He throws his hard (98 mph) sinker 70 percent of the time and it has a launch angle of one degree. Worms were killed. He struck out more last year than ever before, but he still allows too many ball in play. Last year things went his way, but 2022 is an example of what happens when they don't. He will have value in holds leagues if he has the setup job and pitches well, but the rewards are too narrow otherwise in all but the deepest leagues.

Made 23 starts for the Astros last year and his ERA makes him look good, but he allowed a bunch of hits and home runs while walking too many, which should have had worse outcomes in the Wins and ERA columns. The veteran minor leaguer's variety of pitches has helped him dominate at lower levels, but against major leaguers his strikeout rate dropped precipitously. I'd be wary of giving him too long a leash, but winning 11 games can happen when you pitch for a powerhouse.

Led baseball with the most innings pitched without a batter he left on base scoring, which jazzes up the ERA considerably. Eleven homers allowed in 66.3 innings in the majors and Triple-A indicates a potential problem going forward, but solid control of all three of his pitches should limit at least some of the damage.

Last year was a down one for the veteran reliever, who lost velocity, saw his strikeout range plummet and allowed more homers than ever before. His season ended on the IL with shoulder rotator cuff tendinitis, which isn't expected to be a problem this Spring. His potential value, should he end up closing games for whatever reason, has to be tempered by this past year's physical issues and velocity loss.

Skepticism has followed Gallen for years, but he keeps surpassing expectations (except for 2021, when the skeptics said I told you so). As he's matured he's handled the strike zone better and it's hard to argue with the results the last two years. Well, Statcast's xERA was 4.18 last year, so there is that. He isn't a strikeout artist and he doesn't get a lot of soft contact, so there may well be years more like 2021 than 2023 in the future, but there will also be years like the last two, where his talents work out.

He's a groundball throwing lefty who has improved his control enough the last two seasons to be a solid rotation piece for the Marlins. He doesn't throw hard enough to dominate and relies on sinkers, cutters, and sliders to crush lefties. He has a tougher time against righties, but managed them last year. The temptation after such a nice year is to upgrade his prospects, he can truly pitch, but his stuff limitations suggest a cautious approach this year is best.

He's got great stuff and control, doesn't walk many and gets plenty of strikeouts. There are also games he is pounded, which just feels bad, but in the end the results are fine. He had the third worst run support last year and the year before had the seventh best and won 12 games both times. Go figure.

His vulnerability is the long ball, and he's been just as vulnerable versus lefties as righties, at home and on the road, so his best hope is to land in a ballpark with generous outfield dimensions and the wind blowing in. He's had personal problems disrupt him in the past and spent time last August in alcohol rehab. A wild card is what happens if he fixes things, because he's got decent swing and miss stuff and good control. If he can find a way to keep the ball in the park he might have something.

You can see in the earnings scan the headwinds a low-strikeout arm like Gibson faces. But he throws innings and managed to win 15 games for the surging Orioles last summer. The limited upside makes the downside risk rostering him more costly, and I would stay away. But the Cardinals need innings, and you might, too.

For some reason his fastball became a little more hittable last year, but his slider emerged as a valuable substitute. Maybe it was the small increase in velocity, or maybe he changed when he uses it, but the bottom line is he successfully pivoted. While his real ERA has bounced around over the years his FIP and xFIP and xERA all landed near his real ERA last year. He appears to have been unlucky on homers allowed last year, a reason for some optimism, but it's best to be a little cautious with guys who don't strike out 9 per 9 innings pitched.

He was the most unlikely of postseason heroes last year after a very solid regular season, and while there's no real indication that this late success wasn't (mostly) earned, he's likely to give up more hits in the future leading to a higher ERA and WHIP, which would quickly erase much of last year's earnings. Unless his role changes he's only a factor in deep leagues.

A serious velocity decline led to fewer strikeouts, a lot fewer pop-ups (the functional equivalent of a K) and a lot more walks. More balls in play and a higher percentage of hard hit balls led to a pretty much perfect storm of disfunction last year, tanking his fantasy price. As with most pitchers as they reach their 30s Giolito is going to have to adapt to the velocity decline and improve his control to regain at least some of his past success. While that's certainly possible this year, there will be some stubborn types who expect him to bounce back to near ace-hood. Don't bid against them.

Was pretty effective in four late-season starts last year, but the opponents perhaps tell the tale: White Sox, Ohtani-less Angels, Oakland, and Royals. Not a slugger's row. He's very good when he gets out on the mound, but it is telling that his 120 innings pitched last year is his career best. Last year he missed the first two months with an oblique injury but was able to take the mound on his turn most of the rest of the season (he missed time with a back issue and cramping but did not go on the IL for either). Given his history and consistent perfor-mance when he does pitch he's both safe and risky at the same time. He's not a linchpin but a worthwhile chance the Dodgers were willing to pay a lot for, and considering how they've been able to carry Clayton Kershaw along with limited work for the past bunch of years, they may well make it work.

He took a step forward last year, but is still building his approach. That meant too many bases on balls and too many long balls thrown, but better than 2022, at least on the walks part. He's going to have to walk even fewer if he's going to become the ace the Nats traded Juan Soto for, but there's no pressure. He's coming on an age when many good arms figure it out and step up there games, or fall apart and head for the bullpen. No pressure there.

The big right-hander can throw 99 but he struggled with his command in his first year in Triple-A. Give that one to developmental growth and keep an eye on what happens this year. His excellent slider and his heater might be enough for a bullpen role, but if he can get his changeup working at the higher level he could become a part of the Cardinals rotation at any time.

He throws so hard you expect lots of strikeouts but he pounds the lower half of the zone so much that he gets lots of grounders. His control is good enough and he suppresses homers enough that he can be a valuable piece out of the pen, but his fantasy earnings last year spiked because of a high LOB% and having them hit them where his fielders were. His Statcast xBA was a more representative 3.09. Could he end up closing? The possibility that he might should coax an extra buck or two from fantasy players' fists, just don't expect a 1.20 ERA again.

He's been more effective statwise since leaving Colorado, but not radically so. He still allows too many homers, only fewer than he did at altitude. Talentwise, what you see now is what you get, unless he gets extra lucky or extra unlucky, which makes him perhaps useful for streaming against bad teams.

Much like his teammate, MacKenzie Gore, he improved last year but still struggles with his control and allowing home runs. Unlike Gore, he started out the season strong and then fell off in the second half. Like Gore he's a former top prospect at an age when a decisive improvement will prove the scouts right or wrong. His success comes from throwing six pitches in an even wider variety of styles. His downside has been a history of injuries the last two years. What made last year special was his health and a second consecutive season controlling the strike zone masterfully. What is probably unsustainable is a HR/FB rate of 5.2 percent. That was three percentage points better than Justin Verlander, who was second among qualified starters. Gray is a quality pitcher with a bad recent injury history, but if he stays healthy again he might come close to matching his 2023 stats.

He's got great stuff but has so far thrown lots of fly balls that have left the park. Some of that is a function of his home park, which is the easiest to homer in in baseball. He's allowed 25 homers there in his career, but 19 on the road, so it isn't all the ballpark. Green has been basically a two-pitch starter his first two seasons, with an effective slider and a hard but hittable fastball. He's thrown his change up about five percent of the time, and it has been ineffective. Greene is still young and undoubtedly working on a cutter or a sweeper to give hitters something else to worry about. When he finds the right mix he will become the ace that many of us expected to arrive last year.

He says he's coming back and given that he's close to the 3,000 mark there's a good reason for the Royals to do it one more time. He's old but he made 27 starts last year and won only two games, but it wasn't his fault. For pitchers with 140 or more innings he was first in worst run support.

Whatever derailed his 2022 season didn't bother him in his first full season in San Diego. He's just about unhittable and so dominant his tendency to walk hitters doesn't usually hurt him. The velocity on his sinker, which he threw 73 percent of the time last year, was down and somewhat more hittable. Velocity decline is always a concern with hard throwing closers. Will they be able to adjust when wear and tear takes away their dominant heat? Until Hader has to make that adjustment he'll be putting up an elite number of strikeouts, though his save numbers in Houston may take a bit of ahitwea.

He only pitched 19 innings last year in the majors, but had a 10.7 K/9, 2.33 BB/9, and a .93 HR/9. The lowering of his walk rate (he walked 5.51 per 9 in Triple-A) was either some well-timed advice and a change of approach or a freakish accident. Control has always been his issue and if he's solved it he'll jump up the board.

He struggled mightily with his control early in the season, but after a minor league IL stint with a hamstring pull he was called up by the Giants in a desperation move. He had some good games and some bad games but at the least seemed to have regained the ability to throw strikes. Gopher balls, too, sadly, so the overall results were not great but showed some of the promise his status as a top prospect offers. Young pitching prospects often require some time to figure out the algebra of strikes and contact and survival, so there's no guarantee of a Harrison breakout this year, but it is possible.

Missed two months in the middle of the season with a forearm strain, but was effective when he returned in September and served as closer. He did struggle with his control all season long, but between his strikeouts and infield flies, 52 percent of the batters he faced didn't make good contact. His 36.3 percent strikeout rate ranked 11th in baseball of those with 30 or more innings pitched.

The soft-tossing control artist had his best season that was not Covid-shortened since 2019, coming back from a capsular tear in his pitching shoulder that ended his 2022 campaign in August. It was a slow recovery and he didn't get back into a game until late May. After his return he looked like his old self, inducing weak contact and parsimonious with the bases on balls. That's a formula that can work, but it is vulnerable to disruption at any time because there hitters make so much contact.

Returned from cancer treatment in late May, he pitched in five games before going down with an elbow injury that led to TJ. Relievers can get back on the field in a year after TJ, so there is some chance he'll pitch this year, but don't count on any significant contribution until 2025.

There was talk he might get saves in the Angels uncertain bullpen last year, but a bad start to the season had him bouncing up and down between the big club and Triple-A. A strong September saved his stats, but no one expects him to get saves this year.

He's healthy, continues to hit 100 mph, and after he landed in Toronto he toned down the heat and was more effective throwing strikes. He's now signed with the Giants, who plan on using him as a starter. Durability issues in recent years make one skeptical, but this sort of move has worked in the past. I think of Aaron Sanchez and say, kind of.

Changed his mix last year, throwing more sliders and fewer fastballs, and saw his velocity on both pitches soar. His change up turned into a splitter and jumped three mph, too. The changes paid dividends and he had his best season as a major leaguer last year by far. No longer a struggling starter or a fungible middleman, he may not have a closer role to start the season but he now has closer stuff if he's needed.

A modern closer, not necessarily the guy who ends the game but rather the guy who gets the toughest outs. That was Holmes's role last year. Presumably he'll fix some mild second-half control issues and be the main if not only guy getting saves out of the Yankees pen. But as the last two years show, that's not necessarily a role that pays big.

He was unlucky last season with LOB% and HR/FB rate, but he also wasn't that good. Struggles with control landed him in bad counts too often, and he walks too many to get away with much. He's struggled in his career versus lefties (.763 OPS career, .858 OPS in 2023) and the Red Sox have shifted him in and out of the rotation, but he got the chance to start last year. He looks like a starter now, but if he struggles again (4.17 career ERA as a starter) he could go back to the pen (2.68 ERA as a reliever). For me, though, he's a sleeper, a guy with limits I think he might be able to overcome.

Missed the first month last year with a groin pull, and ended the season with elbow inflammation. Traded to the Mets in the offseason, they may have him in the rotation. His pitch to contact style produces many ground balls but not a lot of strikeouts. He's probably best for fantasy in a streaming role if he sticks in the rotation. The danger is he might end up sliding into long relief, which would crush what little fantasy value he has. That is, if he stays healthy.

His velocity is down about a mile per hour from his peak in 2021, which may explain why he allowed more hits last year, but he's been pretty consistent since becoming a closer in Cincinnati in 2017 (apart from working in setup in 2022 after a mid-season trade to Atlanta). Don't expect the dominating strikeout mastery he showed at his peak, but he should continue to get the job done until he slips some more.

After the WBC last year, Eno Sarris reported that Imanaga had the best Stuff+ numbers of the tournament, ahead of Yoshinobo Yanamoto, Jose De Leon, and Julio Urias. He has been very successful in NPB the last two yearns throwing a spinny four-seam fastball that gets swings-and-misses. He has excellent control and gets hitters to chase out of the zone, which is a potent combo. His fastball sits about 92 mph, which is not going to blow hitters away, so we're going to have to see how his finesse and smarts translate. He's definitely worth a modest bet this year.

An ugly start to last season landed him in Triple-A, but he returned in June and in a mix of starting and relieving he posted a solid 3.22 ERA with a more typical 4.25 FIP. He's a pitch to contact guy who has good enough control to eat innings, as he did in Oakland in 2021 and 2022, but is unlikely to best a mid-4 ERA without a good amount of luck and is easily pushed aside by a team on the ups like the Orioles.

For the record, he didn't fall apart because of the pitch clock, as was widely discussed. He did miss time during the season with back and hamstring issues, but avoided the IL until CO-VID knocked him out in mid-September. When healthy he continued to struggle with his control, and he put up the second lowest strikeout rate of his career, more signs that he's aging out. Though maybe not this year.

After his dazzling 2022 season the fact that he's really a two-pitch starter was ignored, and he went into last season as a hot choice. He didn't fail so much as come back to earth, losing three strikeouts per nine and allowing more home runs pitching to hitters who mostly had to choose between his fastball (down one mph) and his slider. It looks like last year's version is the more real one, he grew less effective as the season went on, though surely the Astros will come up with a plan to use him more effectively. Might that be in relief? The possibility should take a few dollars off his price.

Sixteen decisions and four saves! Jax was an action guy last year. Unfortunately, 10 of those decisions were losses. He doesn't have the elevated K-rate you'd like from your setup guy (if you have a setup guy) but his good command and elevated ground ball rate after adopting a sinker last year should continue to be plusses.

Was the Rockies closer to start last season and he saved some games while walking nearly six per 9 innings pitched. Traded to the Braves at the deadline, the angst he was suffering lifted and he was brilliant the rest of the way. Not 0.76 ERA brilliant, but a very solid reliever with a penchant for allowing homers. He should have some value in holds leagues this year, but if he reverts to the walking Johnson he's always been his fantasy value will evaporate quickly.

Slow progress from a talented arm on a bad team. He's in a good position, with a little luck and perhaps a better mix with his off-speed and breaking stuff, to have a breakout season. That's not something to bid him up for, but he's the sort of endgame arm who could pay off.

He pounds the zone low and did a terrific job getting ground ball outs last year. As a Rays reliever he's always a threat to be used in a save situation, though he only had one last year. He's going to need to find some more swing and miss if he's to be dominant enough for more high-leverage use.

He added some sliders last year and juiced his strikeout rate and walk rates. The Diamondbacks will take that, but the big question has been the divergence of his ERA (low) and his xERA and other estimators (higher). In fantasy baseball we pay for the actual ERA so we have to be concerned that his estimators are running more than half a run per nine worse. He's not a bad contributor if he's striking out one per inning on a team with a productive offense, but be concerned that his ERA is going to rise because that's the sort of pitcher he is.

He only threw three innings for the Phillies last year, throwing only 13 percent sinking fastballs (9 total, 98 mph) and 85 percent sweepers (51 total, 86 mph). Obviously this is not enough to make any broad judgments on, but he is expected to slot into the middle innings to start the season. Whether he proves to be shining star or a hunter of the strike zone remains to be seen. PHILLIES

He's been effective in the majors when he isn't allowing homers, but unfortunately he isn't allowing homers too little of the time. He walked far fewer hitters last year than in the past and cut his homer allowed rate to its lowest, not counting the short 2020 season, which along with a healthy win total earned him positive value for the first time. He's a risky play with some little chance of repeating.

He's become too inconsistent to hold the closer role himself alone, it seems, but he's been able to put together enough solid stretches to share the job each of the last three years. He is still throwing enough strikeouts with enough velocity to be helpful to any fantasy team as long as he comes at a discount. In Baltimore he becomes a challenge for Yennier Cano, who I had already discounted.

Shifted to full-time starting on August 24 (he made one earlier start in August) and was limited, pitching more than five innings just twice. He was also effective, allowing more than one run just once, in a meaningless game against the Royals on October 1. His success as a reliever and a starter gives the Padres options, but they will almost certainly have him in the middle of their rotation, as the most solid piece they received in return for their superstar Soto.

Two fastballs thrown 60 percent of the time, with the riding four-seamer dominating hitters, plus a good slider to change things up. The rest of his repertoire is dressing, which is just fine. What sets him apart is his control. He led the league in BB%, walking just 2.5 percent of hitters plate appearances. Those fastballs lead to a fair amount of contact, he's not a strikeout leader, but with so few runners on base he's pretty much always in the game. That makes him a second-tier ace for fantasy.

He missed big chunks of 2022 and 2023 following TJ, but returned last August and pitched well the rest of the way. Solid stuff he has, but he's also had a hard time throwing strikes, a problem compounded because he throws a lot of fly balls and so far in his career they tend to leave the yard too much. Plus a rich history of injuries. He season ended last year with knee surgery but he is expected to be ready for Spring Training. He's trying to earn a spot in the rotation there, but he's going to have to walk fewer batters to be effective out there.

He's been a pitch to contact control artist who has been improving his strikeout rate, mixing his fastball and cutter, but his breaking and off-speed stuff has done him no favors. He's kind of proven that he won't necessarily blow up, but he won 13 games with 14 quality starts, which isn't likely to happen again. And without those wins he's a nullity on the year. Maybe he can be streamed.

Throws far too many walks to be trusted, but he throws hard and gets a lot of swinging strikes, too. If he's the Tigers closer he's going to be rostered and get saves. His ERA and WHIP are likely to hurt, so how much are you willing to pay for saves and strikeouts? Last year's performance seems to be a good model.

After a terrible first six weeks last year he landed on the IL with a shoulder issue in his non-throwing arm. When he returned he was optioned to Triple-A, where he spent most of the rest of the season. He struggled with his control last year, in the majors and the minors, and allowed 16 homers in 46.7 innings, which was the worst rate of any pitcher with more than 40 innings pitched. Home runs allowed have always been a problem for him, one ex-acerbated by all the free passes he gives away. He'd been quietly effective in 2021 and 2022 and could be again if healthier and luckier, but with limited upside potential at this point he should be a tough sell, even in only leagues.

Since the Rockies, a team that almost had a collective negative WAR last season, might do anything, you can't count Lawrence as either in or out as the team's closer. Not now or when they start saying what they will do. They did end up turning to Tyler Kinley last year down the stretch, which wasn't intuitive. Lawrence is a sinker-slider pitcher who hasn't had a problem with the long ball in Colorado, but who has walked a fair number of major league hitters in his major league years (5.16 per 9 innings). A little bid is appropriate at this point, he might end up with the job again, but probably not.

Was announced as the Rangers closer at the start of the season, but before landing on the IL with an ankle sprain he lost what turned out to be a shared job. He pitched well after he returned and ended up closing the last few weeks of the season and on into the playoffs. The Rangers picked up his option this year and he's the likely No. 1 in the pen going into the season, with the skills to support that. It should be noted that they have had opportunities to turn to him before and he's not held the job.

A college star with a multiple major-league pedigree was supposed to advance quickly, but he's struggled with his control in the minors as a pro. If he can figure it out he's got solid mid-rotation skills, but looks farther away from the bigs than he did post draft three years ago.

His struggles as a starter in 2022 landed him in the bullpen, which worked much better for him. Success carried over to last year, where he was the Cubs primary setup guy. His grip on that role is tenuous at best, so even in holds leagues his draft day value figures to be muted.

He didn't pitch in 2022 because of TJ, but he did get drafted No. 17 overall. Last year he pitched 33 innings between the complex, Single-A, and High-A. He struck out a ton of minor leaguers, but he walked a ton as well. He's not likely to make the big club for a couple of years, but should already be on your radar. He's the type of talent that can arrive at any time. PADRES Started last year in the Boston bullpen, stumbled and was released, claimed off wiavers by the Rays and hit the IL with shoulder fatique in late May. He started working as an opener and then, at the end of July, became a standard starter. In the games he started between July 30 and September 23 he had a 3.38 ERA (4.04 FIP, 4.33 xFIP), only struck out 6.61/9 but walked only .70/9. He's going to get another chance in the rotation this year and is very unlikely to have an ERA in the 3s.

He hit the IL in May with a calf injury, but upon further examination that turned out to be a lower leg stress fracture. He made a few rehab starts in August but was shut down again with another stress reaction in his tibia, ending his season. He's a former top prospect, a No. 7 overall in 2019, who has dominated in the major leagues when he isn't allowing homers. That's a recurring theme for pitchers playing for the Reds, even those who throw lots of grounders and strikeouts, as Lodolo does. Assuming he's healthy next year, he should be a solid starter with ace potential if he comes up with a way to better control the long ball.

His 2022 season was magic. He converted to relieving, ended up a closer, set career highs for strikeouts and the lowest homer allowed rate. Actually, 2022 was magic in Baltimore, but soured in Minneapolis. Then last year he regressed to his starter skill-set, with fewer strikeouts and lots of homers allowed. He'll be in the Mets pen this year, probably not in a high-leverage role.

For the second year in a row he remained healthy, and during his first year in Minnesota he regained the strikeout punch he showed in his abbreviated 2021 campaign. Part of that was the addition of a strong slider, replacing his weak cutter and some curve balls. Credit the changes and expect more and better from him going forward, so long as he stays healthy.

Has signed a three-year deal with the Braves worth $30M, at least. The move to a relief role in 2022 seems to have worked, though he hasn't been much of a fantasy earner. He struggled with his control last year, but that came with a big jump in strikeouts. There's probably a balancing point to be found that will work, but the fantasy issue is that the Braves are talking about stretching him back out to a starting role. In his career, he's got a 4.73 ERA as a starter with a .780 OPS allowed. As a reliever, his ERA has been 3.01 with a .602 OPS. In relief, he'll be working in a stacked bullpen with limited access to the high-leverage innings, while as a starter he'll have to show that he can be dominant enough to last three times through the lineup.

After no-hitting the Nationals on August 7, in his second start after being traded to the Phillies, he collapsed, going 2-2 with an 8.01 ERA (6.98 FIP). Before the trade, with the Tigers, he was solid (2.30 BB/9) if not dominating (7.07 K/9). Last year was the first in which he's made 25 starts and the bump in innings from 2022 (up 55 innings) may have led to fatigue. He'll get a fresh start and has a chance to establish himself as a back of the rotation regular.

His low ERA last year was an illusion built on good LOB% luck, but on the whole he didn't pitch poorly. He was sent down in May after a string of short starts and then suffered a knee injury, which kept him out until August. After his recall he made a string of good starts, demonstrating his health and perhaps raising rotation expectations for this year. A career-low strikeout rate last year and a career high walk rate are not usually harbingers of future success, but given his health issues in the past maybe he'll be able to do something if he gets a fresh start.

Did a solid job as a back-of-the-rotation arm last year but allowed too many homers for me or you to feel comfortable expecting him to repeat. Give him a puncher's chance to be useful in an AL-only, especially when the threat of homers is low, and be ready to bail if things go south. Note that the KCBC's Kauffman Stadium is in the bottom third for HRs allowed by both right-handed and left-handed hitters. Savvy move!

After a long wait, Luzardo finally had a year of health and effectiveness. He's got enough strikeout oomph and control at this point to break out, if things go the right way for him. That's no guarantee, especially because he struggled against righties last summer and he was hit hard on the road, but those potential issues can be addressed. If he figures out how to adjust to fix them his power and control will be a big plus.

He only struck out 6.08 per 9 last year, but the key stat is his 56-percent LOB%, which indicates he was likely unlucky. The problem for Lyles, however, is that he's just too hittable. I'm sure when the Royals signed him for two years before last season they were hoping to get the 2022 Lyles, who made 32 starts with a 4.40 ERA. That is peak Lyles, pretty much a breakeven fantasy player in AL Only leagues if you spent the minimum.

Signed with the Tigers after a partially successful comeback from TJ that caused him to miss all of the 2022 season. He missed time after a triceps strain in late April sent him to the IL for two months last year, but was solid enough the rest of the way to earn a nice contract for the next two years. His big issue, as it has been throughout his career, is the number of homers he allows. We'd like to see one per nine innings, but in his major league career he's allowed 25 percent more (1.24), and last year he allowed 1.47. That makes him a tough sell in shallower fantasy formats, but a potential contributor in AL-only.

He had such a rock-solid season in 2021, many of us thought we were one home-happy ballpark away from finding an ace, but since then Mahle finally escaped the Great American Ballpark, but stumbled in Minnesota. Not that he pitched much. He had TJ last May, so his new two-year pact with the Rangers is targeted mostly at 2025. Mahle may return this summer, but most pitchers struggle with their control the first few months back even after successful surgery. Maybe he's worth a stash if you have unlimited IL spots.

Some people (I raise my hand) traded for Manaea at mid-season in an attempt to improve their pitching. And it kind of worked out. Manaea was solid in August and September, reversing the first half's ungainly momentum, though his estimated ERAs were mixed up enough that you could make the case it was all a matter of good fortune and bad evening out. Now with the Mets, he's the sort of skilled but not showy pitcher who sometimes has an other worldy season. I'm not saying this is it, but it could happen.

The No. 9 overall pick in 2016, he was supposed to be a future star, but 45 starts into his major league career he hasn't show the dominant stuff of stardom. He missed 10 weeks with a fractured foot hit by a comebacker in April and his season ended in early September when he was hit with another comebacker (119 mph off the bat of Giancarlo Stanton). What's with that? Without more swing and miss he's unlikely to dominate but he has shown enough control to perhaps hold onto a back of the rotation slot, though it should be noted that his xERA was an unseemly and fantasy unfriendly 5.48. Still, he's a worthy flier in AL only leagues, if you're ready to bail quickly if he doesn't get it going.

Everyone knew he'd been at least somewhat lucky his first two years, but no one anticipated the massive correction and breakdown that arrived last year. His season ended with him shut down with inflammation in his throwing arm, but he didn't require surgery and is expected to be healthy come Spring Training. The Blue Jays say he'll get every chance to earn his way into the rotation, even though he was sent to the minors twice last year. He lost his ability to control his pitches last year, which led to more walks and also to more bad counts, which led to harder hit balls and more home runs. He struggled with his control in his brief minor league stints so there is no good reason to think he will regain it over this winter. Though of course he's going to try and he might. He fell so far into the hole last year it's hard for me to imagine betting on a comeback, but it's likely someone in your league will.

He hit the IL early in the season with shoulder inflammation, but missed just two weeks and was fine when he came back. Oddly, his strikeout rate crashed on the year and his walk rate jumped a bit (it was still good) and he was more effective than he'd been in years. Some of that is illusion but he should be a fine setup guy who can close if he's asked to, as he was by the Red Sox last September. Note also his age, which might not be immaterial.

He's being paid $13M for each of two years by the Reds, which I guess sets the bar for projects and odd lots. Martinez qualifies as an odd lot because he's worked the swing position each of the last two years in San Diego. He began and finished last season in the Padres rotation, but in between, he worked in relief. Not long relief, just going for an inning usually. It was a similar role to 2022, his first back from Japan, and could serve as a model for the Reds. He was better as a starter in 2023, but better as a reliever in 2022. Uncertainty and his below-average strikeout profile should keep his price down. Given the Reds young staff and always limited payroll, Martinez could find himself in the rotation or in the bullpen. He doesn't strikeout enough hitters to be of mixed league interest, but in NL Only leagues he could, if he and the Reds get lucky, be a surprising source of wins.

A solid middle reliever but he hasn't been the Astros primary setup guy up to this point. Skills are strong enough for more leverage if his team needs it. He spent time on the IL last summer with an elbow strain but came back in September and finished strong.

In 10 seasons in Japan he had 236 saves, striking out 12 per 9 and walking 4 per 9. That's good, but not necessarily a lock for major league success. But perhaps it's more helpful to look at the last few years. Since 2021, he's struck 12.3, 14.5, and 11.3 per 9, while walking 4.4, 3.3, and 2.0. So, he's a better pitcher today than he was when he was young. He's small (5'8") but throws a spinny fastball that works up in the zone. He also throws a splitter that works down in the zone. In Japan, at least. Short lefties don't usually become closers, five (John Franco, Billy Wagner, Josh Hader, Tippy Martinez, Tom Burgmeier) have 100 or more career saves, but Matsui is in a good position to get a shot at the job and has a fair chance of succeeding with it.

A slow start in the rotation landed him in the pen at the end of May, and he shone in that role until July, when he regained the rotation. He pitched well while starting, making four straight quality starts before landing on the IL with a strained lat, ending his season. Clearly his health is an issue, he only pitched 48 innings in 2022, but when he's on he's got fine control and a fastball-changeup combo that keeps hitters off balance.

He pitched effectively in eight of his nine starts last year, but he ended up having July flexor tendon and UCL reconstruction revision surgery. The timetable for his return is midseason, though given his injury history it's probably best not to count on that. Still, he could be a sneaky cheap pick if your league has unlimited IL slots.

Acquired off of waivers from the Phillies in May, the Royals made some adjustments and transformed him (if September is any indication) into a dominant, closer-like pitcher. One month does not a career make, and his is just one of a number of closer-like arms in the Royals bullpen this year, so it's possible to get too far ahead on him. But McArthur is a sleeper closer.

Tore a shoulder muscle in Spring Training and was out until the beginning of June, then soon went down with an elbow strain. He made two starts at the end of the season and was hit hard enough, though that matters less than the notion that he would have a more or less normal offseason. One of those guys who exemplifies the idea that some pitchers can beat the odds and be valuable pitchers without missing bats and throwing strikeouts. Means doesn't walk many, which helps, but he gets beat up plenty, allowing nearly two homers per 9 innings pitched in his career. In his first year back from TJ he got the work in, then skipped the playoffs because of elbow soreness, but the Orioles have said that was normal and that he'd be fine for spring training. He'll throw some good games this year if he's healthy, but there will also be dogs. Be careful here, I means it.

He got 25 starts last year, enough to show that his hard fastball and slider can't make it through the lineup a third time. His ERA each pass? 3.71 the first time, 4.01 the next time, but 8.37 the third time. The OPS version? .719 the first time, .744 the next, and 1.073 the third time. He needs a role change, but still doesn't throw enough strikeouts to warrant a bid.

He's always seemed like one of the least-skilled closers in the game, probably because he hasn't put up big strikeout numbers, yet he ranks 33rd in career saves since the start of the Rotisserie era in 1980. He missed all of 2023 with a shoulder strain and given his age it's hard to imagine him making it back, but he has yet to retire.

He pumped up the velocity a bit last year and the Cubs gave him room to setup their closer and he responded with nearly 100 strikeouts. He walks too many for anyone to be happy with, and that led to a less than helpful WHIP, but if you need strikeouts and a closer in waiting he should be a cheap option.

August 2022 TJ followed his major league debut that year. He's expected to be healthy for Spring Training and will be given every chance to join the Marlins rotation. He's got a great slider and a hard fastball, but his change up has been considered weak. He's a talented pitcher but may find himself struggling in the rotation this time around. Still, there is talent here.

A solid innings eater in real baseball, but way too hittable to have more than modest value in fantasy. His control is sharp enough he can pitch deep into games, but with so many balls put into play there are going to be a fair number of hits. Last year he was unlucky with runners left on base, a reason to expect a little better this year, maybe, but apart from his wonderful and anomalous 2022 season he's best treated as an endgame starter in NL Only leagues.

A super-low BABIP and super-high LOB% dress up last year's typically poor ERA. Statcast's xERA is the best of the estimators, at 4.36, while xFIP was 4.85. Given his age, lack of strikeouts, and uneven track record, probably best to stay away unless he lands in an irresistible situation, in which case don't get too close.

The heat-throwing youngster had a terrific debut after just shy of 36 innings in Triple-A. He ranked third in Eno Sarris's Pitch+ measure, well above average in Stuff and above average in Location, behind only Tyler Glasnow and Zack Wheeler. Despite his fastball velocity (99 mph) he didn't dominate with it last year, but you can bet the Dodgers are working on his mix and approach to hitters and will be trying to stack every edge he has. Hard-throwing hurlers with good control on teams with hitters like the Dodgers have are irresistible, even if they didn't miss as many bats as you would have hoped they would during their rookie season.

Stellar control impressed last year, but he was hit pretty hard and a bunch of them fell for homers. He tends to the fly ball profile which means he doesn't need bad luck to allow too many homers. His repertoire leaned heavily fastball, which may or may not prove to be a problem going forward, but his ERA the first through the order was 3.02, the second time 4.47, and the third time 7.25. He also struggled with lefties, against whom he had a .916 OPS as opposed to a .549 against righties. With his excellent control and fine fastball he's got a solid foundation on which to build, but future growth shouldn't be assumed.

Has had trouble staying healthy, but showed off his big right arm and overheated fastball in Oakland last year. After he returned from a UCL sprain last September he pitched short stints, maxing out at three innings, and there is talk about moving him to the bullpen to try to keep him healthy this year. That could mean saves or holds, plus strikeouts behind his 100+ mph heater. Too much risk to pay too much, but if he makes it though Spring Training he should be on your list.

After six years in the wilderness he made it back to something like a full-time (with lengthy IL stay for a neck injury) job out of the Dodgers bullpen. After a scintillating two months and after the IL stay, Miller came back in August to finish the season with 12 scoreless innings in which he struck out 11 and walked one. He signed with the Tigers in the offseason and figures to work there as a setup guy. Not likely draftable to open the year, he might be a helpful fill-in piece at some point in-season.

Adopted an effective changeup and has been a very effective setup guy out of the bullpen. Last year's stellar and roto-earning production, however, was fueled mainly by situational luck. That isn't to say that he isn't a useful bullpen part for the Brewers or that he might not succeed in a higher-leverage role, but he's much more likely to end up with 2022's numbers than 2023's going forward.

It's anyone's guess how he's going to pitch after missing nearly all of 2022 and 2023 with an elbow injury and TJ. No. 1 overall in 2018, expectations were high, but if he is healthy as claimed he now has to rehab and regain his skills. He could do it right off the bat or it could take some time or, in the worst case, it might not ever happen. What's for certain is that he'll be handled carefully by the Tigers.

February arthroscopic surgery caused him to miss most of the year. In my AL Only I bought him for $1, hoping he''d get back at some point. If he missed the whole year he wouldn't be eligible to freeze this year, so there was real suspense the last couple of weeks. He pitched 1.3 innings on September 30. Alas, he signed in the NL, so bye-bye. He's a year-and-a-half on from being an effective starter. He melted down in 2022 after being traded from Oakland to the Yankees. Given his past injury history and that meltdown the risk increases quickly as his price goes up, and would even if he weren't coming back from surgery and essentially a lost season. And even more so as he moves to Cincinnati and a very homer friendly park. His career HR rate per 9 is 1.09.

His improving fortunes the last three years derive from an increasing win total and decreasing ERA. Attribute the former to an increasing number of innings and the latter to good fortune. His xERA each of the last three years was 4.06, 4.00, and 4.04. Consistency epitomized. He's developed into a fine mid-rotation hurler who doesn't throw enough strikeouts to be exciting to fantasy players. Last year was a good one for him, but don't expect a repeat.

He's striking out enough hitters to have value even if he isn't getting saves or holds (in leagues that count them), but he had 22 holds last year and clearly the best hope is that he ends up closing games at some point. Eye-catching stuff (especially that slider) that is super-hard to hit, but he's too wild to efficiently get the job done. Which makes him look like a potential closer at times, but got him sent down to Triple-A in a roster squeeze after he came off the IL last August. In all likelihood he ends up in middle relief again this year, but it wouldn't take much improvement for him to grab the setup role. Consider him a deep relief sleeper.

The move to the pen in 2022 helped him add velocity and strikeout punch, but there aren't indications his role will be bumped up, surely in part because he's prone to allowing damaging homers.

Moved to the bullpen last year, mostly in Triple-A but also for six major league games, and lost control, walking more than six per nine at those two levels. He started the season on the IL with a strained lat, which may have affected him after he returned for any number of reasons. It isn't yet clear whether the Yankees intend to use him as a starter or a reliever, but in either case unless he sparkles in Spring Training he's more of a reserve or waiver wire shot than draftable.

The Braves exercised their $20M option after the season ended, so he'll be in their rotation again this year. Being able to throw 150 innings is worth something. But Morton is a shadow of the hurler that emerged in Houston seven years ago. With some good run support and defense he could surprise us this year, but we've seen in the past two seasons evidence of his struggles to limit both homers or walks.

Fireballer moved from holder to closer when Paul Sewald was traded at the deadline, and he did fine while closing, less fine when coming into tie games. He spent a month early in the season on the IL with a shoulder strain, and while the strikeouts kept a comin' after he re-turned, his early-career struggles with control returned, too. He should be the closer from the git-go this year, with strikeout generating heat that should raise his cost, increasing risk.

His season ended in early August with shoulder inflammation, but he's expected to be ready for Spring Training. He started throwing again in late September. His season started late because of a fractured toe and then he hurt his shoulder diving for a ball in a rehab game. That supposedly is unrelated to his later shoulder issues, but obviously his shoulder health and velocities should be monitored closely. As it is, he's a control artist who mixes pitches and speeds to keep hitters off balance, with a solid floor if healthy and a limited ceiling because of the limited number of strikeouts he throws.

He walked a lot fewer hitters last year than in his first big-league taste (14 in 14.7 IP in 2022), but nobody won as many games as he did pitch-ing as few innings last year. As the lefty setup guy in Miami this year he's likely to get plenty of chances at holds, and is probably behind Tan-ner Scott for saves.

Made 27 starts and was hit too much and too hard while failing to miss enough bats. Some scouts have seen him more as a reliever than a starter and while it's too soon for us to judge that, many a mediocre starter has excelled in relief. He's a talented pitcher, so it's best to keep an eye out for where he ends up. In either case a $1 endgame bid in NL Only leagues.

A fine setup guy the last two years in Houston, he had more than a one mph decrease in velocity last year and a bump up in walks allowed, which is not the direction you like to see. Even with the extra walks he's kept runners off the bases by not allowing many hits. As a fly ball pitcher that's sustainable as long as the ball stays in the park, which it has the last two years, but the only reason to buy into him is the chance he ends up closing. Careful.

His bad ERA masks what was a pretty typical year for Nola, who was punished by the second-lowest LOB% among qualified starting pitchers and the fifth-highest HR/FB percentage (and the highest of his career). All that could be bad luck, but his K/9 was the lowest of his career since his rookie year in 2015, which should give you a moment's pause. The same thing happens to most pitchers as they age, and some but not all are able to adjust. He should have better years going forward but to roster him this year you'll have to pay as if that's a sure thing.

He began last year in Triple-A, was called up in late April, was demoted in August after a rough patch but had his best run of the season after getting called up again in September. Ober has excellent control and three plus pitches, plus an effective but mistake-prone slider. He's not a hard thrower and gives up so many fly balls he's vulnerable to the big ones. More fine years like last year wouldn't be a surprise, but it wouldn't take much for him to derail, too.

Fine control and some good fortune offset tough luck with runners left on base coming around to score. The red flag here are the homers allowed. If he's able to keep runners off base he can limit the homer damage, as he did last year, but he hasn't shown enough swing and miss ability to reduce the homers, despite throwing quite a few grounders. He might last as a back of the rotation innings guy, maybe even a pretty good one, but with a limited ceiling.

Declined his $6.75M player option and became a free agent, though it's hard to see a pitcher with his declining skills at an advancing age getting more. He did save 12 games and blew three and he has a good history of health. Still, he's not likely to have draft day fantasy value even if a major league team thinks he'll help them.

Middle relievers can rise up in value for any number of reasons, but they are not usually reproducible or predictable. Pagan has skills that might help if you need help, but his history before last year was at best mixed. I look at him as a waiver pickup if he's going good.

Painter's talents were so strong that when the Phillies announced in Spring Training that the youngster might make the rotation the immediate reaction was excitement rather than concern. But as might be expected from a young arm tasked with making the big leagues after 28 innings in Double-A at age 19, Painter went down with an injury in Spring Training that led to July TJ. Still hugely talented, he shouldn't be expected to resume his minor league career until Spring Training 2025.

True fact: Only one pitcher with a minimum of 20 innings pitched had a higher LOB%. That's easier when, like Pepiot, you don't allow very many baserunners, and, like Pepiot, you allow a lot of home runs. He's a fly ball pitcher, so that pattern isn't unusual except by degree. Those homers are Pepiot's Achilles heel, but as a pitcher who going into last year struggled with command, his ability to avoid walks last year was a big step forward. He should work out of the rotation this year with the Rays (he made three starts last year, 18 innings pitched, with a 2.00 ERA), and if he can control the long ball (the Rays ballpark should help) he could be a solid fantasy starter.

The story of last year is No injuries! He also showed improved control of the strike zone and his hard to hit stuff. He was hit harder than he's been hit since 2019, which may be a fluke (it was his worst year for homers per fly ball ever) or may not (hard hit against was up), but we won't know until he does it again. He's not going to go deep into games, so be prepared for some wins to be spoiled, but if that keeps him healthy he should be a fantasy contributor again.

He had a fine rookie half-season spreading from May to September designed to not stress his arm. He turned 20 just days into the season, had pitched 77 innings in 2022, mostly in Double-A. The alarming indicator in his performance last year was the tendency to allow homers. He's a fly ball pitcher and works up in the zone with his 97 mph heater. It's a tough pitch to hit until it isn't, 10 of his homers allowed came off the pitch. But with a crushing slider, a tough curve, and a useful change he has other options. He'll surely be coddled a bit this year, as he should, but that's all to the good if it keeps this ace-in-the-making on the mound.

I rode Martin's 2022 miracle season on a few of my fantasy teams, and I watched him pitch a bunch. His is not the stuff of a dominating arm, but he seemed to have an advanced feel for which pitch to throw in which location. He didn't need to strike guys out because all those weak grounders were like strikeouts. Alas, what was true in 2022 wasn't in 2023. The cutter lost its magic and he had to scrap. That scrapping led to his removal to the bullpen at the start of August, and he was very effective there working in long relief. He's now signed with the Pirates, which should be a challenge and likely mean a return to the rotation. I'm not saying stay away, he's a fine pitcher in approach, but be careful because he lacks the tools to do his job decisively. So things can go wrong.

His ability to get strikeouts took a hit while pitching for the Diamondbacks, but it is his inability to stifle homers that has the potential for his undoing. He has terrific control, but throughout his time coming up through the minors he's allowed more than one-and-a-half homers per nine innings pitched. That's a heavy burden even if you're getting 10+ strikeouts per 9, which he did not last year in the majors. This problem isn't a secret and Pfaadt is surely working with coaches to address it, so his terrific stuff may soon play better, but the issue's intractability so far has me doubting that this year will be the one. There will be some demand, but the chance that he'll only modestly improve this year is a reason to not fight too hard for him.

Made five starts for the Reds last September and struggled with his control, an outcome predictable from his history. He also was hit hard, which led to five homers in just 20 innings. He'll likely start the year in Triple-A, refining his heater-slider-curve mix but will only get a shot at real big league success is if he can better throw strikes. REDS

The last couple years, after getting his control issues under control, he's looked like a closer and last year got to act like one. The secret, of course, is his adoption of the cutter, which isn't a secret at all. He threw fewer strikeouts last year, which drops him out of the elite closer group and makes him perhaps a tad more affordable.

He started and ended the year in the rotation but was most effective overall when he worked as a reliever. His flexibility may be helpful to a major league team, but is a liability in fantasy. His problem both ways is his propensity to throw fly balls and the homers that follow. He showed last year that can have fantasy value, but he's shown most other years that that value is very limited.

He throws a lot of fly balls and last year, unlike in 2022, not that many left the yard. But his real value last year was being in the right place at the right time in order to reel in 12 wins in relief. He came into 22 games that were tied or when the Rays were down one run, and while that could happen again he's unlikely to win half those games (though the Rays potent offense is a better bet to convert than many other teams). He also earned 22 holds, which has obvious value in some leagues.

Had some rough patches last summer and some smooth ones, but the overall results were solid enough. It was his worst season since 2017, the year before he started to throw more sliders and fewer fastballs, changing his whole profile and becoming much more effective and, starting in the Covid short season, a closer. The culprits were off-speed pitches, his change and curve, which were pounded at times but also got his most swings and misses. Consider last year's issues situational for now, but monitor his work closely early in the season for signs of more slippage rather than recovery. He's at an age where decline should not be a surprise.

He improved his control in Triple-A last year but it's still not where you would like it to be, as demonstrated by his major league performance. He could see a more protracted time in Pittsburgh this year, but is going to have to walk fewer hitters to have fantasy value. Finally, he's established himself as a solid relief pitcher and potential closer. Against lefties, at least. Against lefties last year he allowed a .578 OPS, while against righties that jumped to .765. Missed a month in May and June with a nerve issue in his elbow and was effective for a time after he returned, but from July 5 to the end of the season he struggled with a 4.99 ERA (4.43 FIP) and allowed eight homers in 30.7 innings. He throws enough strikeouts to be useful in NL only leagues even if he isn't closing, but becomes problematic if that homeritis carries over to this year. Notably, this year, the Marlins intend to move him to the rotation, a move that seems so doomed to failure I'm not yet changing his projection.

For two years he managed to sustain low ERAs while walking a tightrope of runners on base and not so many strikeouts. Last year was statistical payback time and he was punished with an ERA that may be been worse than he pitched. But he also struck out the fewest hitters of he career and walked the most, so there was earned badness, too. Now on the Rockies, coming off a season with multiple trips to the IL with shoulder inflammation, he could have his best season and safely be ignored for most fantasy purposes.

He doesn't get a lot of strikeouts but his career ERA of 3.74 is matched by his xFIP and FIP. He missed the first half last year because of a stress fracture in his ribs, but brought his decent control and keep-the-ball-out-of-the-seats style to Citi Field. He can be a help in NL Only leagues if you don't pay too much for him and avoid bad matchups. He added three miles per hour going into last season, but struggled with the Rangers while pitching in longish relief. They traded him to the Royals for Aroldis Chapman at the All Star break and the Royals quickly added him to their rotation. He somehow immediately became a different pitcher, striking out more than two more per nine while walking nearly two fewer. And fly balls stopped flying out of the park. We're dealing with small samples on both sides of Ragans' 2023 divide, but the Royals had Ragans throw his slider more and the pitch was very effective. His improved control still meant nearly four batters per nine innings got a free pass, so he's not out of the woods yet, but unless the market goes crazy for him there is the chance this former first rounder will be a bargain at draft time. Especially in mixed leagues.

He was released by the Nationals last June, when he was striking out just 4.33 per 9 innings, with a 6.33 ERA. The Rays sent him to the minors for a stretch and worked their magic. After he was recalled in July he struck out 8.10 per 9, and walked fewer hitters too. Unfortunately, he had 6.48 ERA, though a 4.01 xFIP. His xFIP in Washington was 5.62. May 2023 TJ means he might get in a few starts late in the season, which might make him a savvy endgame play in keeper leagues. That's why the Giants signed him for two years. Given the lengthy time off before the 2025 season, he might have worked through the control issues that crop up for starters a year and a half after the surgery.

Take out the final eight-runs-with-no-outs final start of Rodon's season and he still was terrible last year. A string of injuries, including talk of chronic back pain, kept him off of the field much of the time, and when he was able to pitch he was often ineffective. When healthy he's shown how dominant he can be, but with only two seasons of his nine with more than 150 innings pitched, the risk of getting nothing out of him or worse is very real.

He's been a quality pitcher who never seemed to catch a break. Injuries and COVID got in the way of his expression of excellence in past years, it seemed, but now that he's had a very good year it's hard not to notice that his improvement comes in areas in which he's not really much in control. He allowed fewer hits last year, so his WHIP was down, and allowed fewer homers than ever before while throwing fewer ground balls than he has since 2018. He missed five weeks with a finger injury in June/July, so he didn't escape the injury bug entirely, either. A solid pitcher when he's on, but not as solid as he appeared last year. Chase Field these days is not a bad place to pitch, however, and Arizona's strong defense is a step up from the middlin' Tigers.

He made the Orioles out of camp and struggled with a 7.35 ERA in eight starts before getting his ticket punched to Triple-A. Success there led to his recall, and in the second half he had a 2.58 ERA. There were differences in his approach. More strikeouts and walks and homers allowed in the first half, fewer of each in the second. He has excellent stuff and has a chance to be an elite starter if he continues to minimize the bases on balls and homers allowed. He did throw a lot more innings last year than in 2022 at a young age, which is sometimes a precursor to arm trouble. Bidding will be a game of chicken.

Things were going better for him last April than they had in 2022, but then he strained his biceps, hit the IL, and partially tore his lat while rehabbing. His success in 2021, in a partial season, has to be discounted for now. The velocity bump he had when he was successful has smoothed and he has yet to show he can make his heater-change combo work without it. Which doesn't mean he's a sure bum.

He's got a terrific arm, a lively fastball, and good control, but last year he allowed quite a few homers and that hurt. He added two new off-speed pitches in the spring, intending to reduce the fly balls he allowed, and had some success in the first half of the season. But he struggled to a 6.09 ERA in the second half with 2.63 HR/9 allowed (versus 1.35 in the first half). The rule of thumb is that outsized HR/FB rates regress toward the 10 percent mark, so maybe the rate will slow this year, but as a fly ball pitcher Ryan is always going to allow a lot of homers. The key is keeping runners off base before lightning strikes. If he figures out how to do that Ryan could have a big year.

Returned from 2022 TJ last August and made 11 starts working out the post-surgery kinks. He didn't get all the way there but showed some signs that with a winter of rehab and recharging he might. At his best he combines masterful control and command while mixing a variety of pitches and speeds to keep hitters off balance. When that doesn't work he's susceptible to allowing long balls, but when he's keeping hitters off base those don't hurt as much. The opposite is also true, of course.

Despite missing more than two months with a stress reaction in his left shoulder, he broke 100 innings pitched for the first time since 2019. Perhaps more importantly, after a slow start he had a strong May (before the injury) and a solid September (after the injury). This isn't to say he's back, because he did miss more than a third of the season, but he's still capable of pitching effectively when he can take the mound. Note that his ERA was inflated last year because of a low LOB%. Now the Braves are on him, and someone in your league is going to push his price into the teens again, which as the past few years have shown is risky, but a more modest winning bid could pay dividends.

His repertoire is sinker, slider, changeup and it generates a lot of ground balls. Among pitchers with more than 90 IP last year he ranked fourth in ground ball percentage, behind only Logan Webb, Alex Cobb, and Marcus Stroman. Unfortunately, he also ranked first in HR/FB if first means the most homers allowed, but happily he also ranked fifth in walk rate, meaning fewest walks per nine innings. Though there is nothing in his prospect profile that foreshadows his control and success last year, for now the proof lies in what he was able to get done. At least against lefties, who had little success against him (2.16 FIP). Righties, on the other hand, had a 4.56 FIP against him. He'll try to build off last year's success, but be prepared for him to return to the bullpen.

Benefitted from a ridiculously low BABIP last year, which didn't help his ERA too much because he allowed so many homers, but it left him with a very attractive WHIP, even though he walks more than you'd like. He's not a reliever to target on auction/draft day.

We knew his great 2022 ERA was artificially deflated, so his regression last year wasn't a surprise. Both years he didn't allow home runs, which limited the damage, but his falling strikeout rate and rising walk rate are a sign of trouble even if he's able to continue limiting hard hit balls. There is some potential for another fine season from Sandoval, but it's a thin line between that and losing.

Pitched well in the first half and got a chance to close in August, but he fumbled the chance with a 6.75 ERA that month and a 4.76 in September before he hit the IL with elbow inflammation. He throws a hard sinker and a less-hard slider and gets lots of ground balls, but doesn't strike out enough to excite 5x5 fantasy players unless he collects saves (or holds, if you count them). No guarantee he'll get another chance at closer, though at present he seems to be the guy.

By the end of last year, as he was taken off the World Series roster, he seemed bloodied and perhaps done. In his three postseason starts he threw a total of 9.7 innings with a 6.52 ERA. He tried to rehab but decided in December to have surgery to repair a ruptured disk in his back. The prognosis is he'll be back by July, maybe, and the Rangers will surely try to protect him during the regular season so that he'll be helpful as they defend their title. What worries me is that for three straight years he's been pitching with good BABIP luck, helpful LOB% rates, and in two of those years elevated HR/FB rates. With a little worse luck and bad timing his numbers wouldn't look nearly so good. He's also seen his fastball velocity decline each year. His price shouldn't be pushed. Getting back peak Scherzer is very unlikely.

Converted from relief to starter last year and held up for 32 starts, with a 70 IP jump. Some say that a big jump puts youngsters at risk, but Schmidt isn't a youngster at this point. Still, we'll see. Another question: Is Schmidt cut out to be a starter. Last year his OPS first time through the order was .689, second time .815, third time .910. He's had good success starting in Triple-A, but he's been much more hittable in the majors.

Was part of a trio of putative closers in the first half and he struggled with his control early, then began to put it together in June. The trio was subsumed when the Marlins picked up David Robertson at the trade deadline, but as he struggled Scott shone and was the team's closer down the stretch. He threw a lot of innings in a lot of games last, which is often a precursor to struggles the next, but not always. Balance what appeared to be a skills advance with increased injury risk and indicated role while bidding.

He allowed homers in 21 of his 32 starts and had a record of 2-11 in those games with an ERA of 5.77. In the 11 no-homer games he was 3-3 with a 2.25 ERA. The importance here isn't the difference in effectiveness, these two groups were selected for that, but for the number of games Sears allowed dingers. There is hope for Sears, he has good location and good movement, but he is going to have to figure out a way to reduce the hard contact in the air if he's going to thrive.

He had a terrific rookie season, but most of the indicators argue for a little less terrific this season. Expect some more runners he's left on base to score, and maybe a few more fly balls to leave the park, but his cutter and splitter are so good that he should be able to limit the damage. He throws lots of fly balls and can be hurt when they go yard, especially because his control isn't great. He gets strikeouts and limits hard contact, which is why he's been a pretty effective closer the last two years. He struggled a bit in Arizona after the trade, but it was a small sample and it was just three games out of 20 that did the damage. A reasonable choice as a fantasy closer going into this year, though reasonable is far from a guarantee.

His first two starts in June were quality, if you know what I mean, and his last one in September was, too. In between he mixed in stinkers and some good short ones. His skills are okay. Or rather he has two good pitches, a 95 mph heater and a good change, and a developing slider that was somewhat effective. HIs control and ability to keep the ball in the park given his fly ball friendly profile are works in progress. For what it's worth, Sheehan gave up 2023's hardest hit ball with an exit velocity of 121.2 mph. The batter? Ronald Acuna Jr., so it may just be a matter of power meeting power. Sheehan might take the next step at any time, but there's a fair chance he'll end up in middle relief. This should be a year to get a cheap roll of the dice or else pass.

A hot spring training and the Braves hurting starters landed Shuster in the rotation for parts of the first half of the season, and he ended up striking out 25 and walking 22 in 45 innings. That's not enough hit and miss or control to hold onto a major league roster spot and he spent much of the second half in Triple-A, with a few spot starts when there were injuries. His lower-minor successes were built on great control and a terrific change up. The White Sox will try to make that work in Triple-A this year.

His season ended in September when he went on the IL with a back strain. Before that he suffered through a wrenching season that mixed highs and lows, looked worse than it was, but all in all was just not that good. He's a control ace with two good pitches and a change he throws about eight percent of the time. He gets lots of ground balls and did so again last year, but last year he also struck out fewer hitters and walked more, and when the ball was put in play he was hit hard. Nearly 50 percent of his balls in play were Hard Hit. That probably explains his somewhat high BABIP. Can he bounce back? Maybe, but with his velocity down a tick last year, and no sign that his repertoire is expanding, it's tough to see how.

He was the No. 1 overall pick in 2023 out of LSU, which is a special kind of pedigree. He's big and strong, has two great pitches already, and the talent to add more. The value question of this year is do the Pirates push him or do they give him some time in Triple-A to adjust to the professional baseball life? The range of outcomes stretches from Rookie of the Year, at best, to doesn't get graduated from Triple-A. That's if injury doesn't get him. It's going to take a healthy bid if you want to risk it, though we'll surely know better what to expect once the camps are in session.

Came back from 2022 flexor tendon surgery in July and it took a while for him to find his footing, but he finished the season strong, allowing three earned runs in 30 innings in September (that's a 0.90 ERA) while striking out 43 and walking four. On the season he ended up with elite strikeout rates (high) and walk rates (low) while throwing a lot of ground balls and infield flies. This is a super-elite profile from a former top prospect, but in a small sample, so enthusiasm should be reined in. But if you want to roll the dice and take a chance, Skubal is a good bet.

Made his first major league start in June and hopped over to Atlanta from Gwinnet a few more times before the season was over. Stepped into the closer role in May and did a solid job through July, but fell apart the last two months of the season. His strikeout rate sank to 7.20 and his walk rate rose to 3.24 (from 9.74 and 2.23) while his HR/FB rate nearly doubled. He's always been better versus lefties than righties, and with so much career mileage on his arm his future may be more specialization and less leverage. With the Royals, however, more leverage may well be expected.

He allowed a lot of baserunners and a bunch of them scored, but he still managed to win 11 games on a mediocre team. Seven came in the first half of the season, when he made 19 starts. Four came after he became a reliever. He had a 5.72 ERA as a starter, a 2.51 as a reliever. He was successful as a reliever back in 2013, his second year in the majors, but had mostly worked as a starter ever since. I wonder what the Cubs are going to do this year?

In the four years since his whole season pitched he was for the most part effective, but he missed starts, gave up too many homers in some years, and was unlucky in others. Was 2023 a return to form? As in 2018, he had a lucky LOB%, a low BABIP, and walked more batters at a higher rater than in any other year. Still, his career as a whole isn't bad, just abbreviated. With a 3.44 FIP and a 1.24 career WHIP and 1,223 strikeouts in 992.7 innings, Snell is an ace, if a minor one because of the injuries.

Since 29 starts back in 2019 he's had two Achilles' surgeries and last season ended in early September with forearm inflammation that required surgery. In that brief window when he was healthy he was not dominating but crafty and effective. He was able to be non-dominating last year but was also ineffective. At this point the upside isn't there to reach past his injury history, but if he starts looking good at all (and healthy) getting him for cheap could be a help.

When I was in high school a bunch of us hung out on top of a pump house in Gaynor Park near the basketball courts in St. James, NY, where there was always a pickup game going on. One day we saw a guy in a Giants uniform holding a clinic on the baseball diamond nearby.

It was Chris Speier, Gabe Speier's uncle. We were a little awed. Gabe came into his own last season as a lefty setup guy for the Mariners. If you thought lefty specialists were a thing of the past, look at Speier's usage last year. He pitched 54.7 innings in 69 games, facing 105 lefties (against whom he had a .535 OPS) and 111 righties (against whom he had a .780 OPS). He will probably never get an MVP vote, as his uncle once did, but he was a useful piece properly used last year by the Seattle team.

His season ended in April after two excellent starts and a third abbreviated one. He had TJ shortly thereafter and could be back by mid-season this year, but history suggests even if the surgery goes well he'll struggle at first with his control. A pick to avoid this year.

Was very successful with two pitches (fastball/slider) after converting his four-seamer to a cutter. Plus, dramatic improvement in his control. He's probably more of a 3.50-3.75 ERA guy than the sub 3.25 he's been the last two years, but who really knows? Somehow he did it twice in a row.

He struggled with his control in September and the bad month wrecked his season-long stats, but apart from the free passes he didn't pitch badly. He may not reach the heights he showed in 2022 again, but there's a good chance he'll serve as Emmanuel Clase's setup guy again, which would make him valuable in hold leagues.

A dramatic turnaround after he landed in Tampa from Pittsburgh, maybe because in the early season he was still recovering from a sore elbow that kept him out until mid-April. Or maybe it's just that the Rays are great at getting the most out of a lot of pitchers. In any case, he's signed with the Angels for three years and nice coin. It will be one of the year's most interesting stories if the changes the Rays helped him with last year stick.

Two surgeries and three years away from the big leagues and Brock Stewart returned with a nearly six mph faster fastball, a cutter, and a sweeper. He nearly doubled his strikeout rate from 2019, his last time in the majors, with only a tick up in walk rate. He did spend time on the 60-day IL last summer with a sore elbow, so health worries aren't a thing of the past, but if he can stay healthy the new Brock Stewart is a powerful setup guy who could close if called on.

A fifth rounder in 2020, he spent most of last year in Triple-A and struggled with his control. He did get the call to the Dodgers in May, made three starts and things did not go well, walking seven and striking out four in 10 innings, allowing 16 earned runs. He also allowed eight homers in 31 innings while with the big club. He has potential as a back of the rotation starter, but clearly needs to improve his approach to tap into it. There's no better place than LA to learn how to maximize your pitching skills.

In his 10 starts he only went five innings three times and earned two of his nine wins, so for fantasy purposes he was much more valuable as a reliever. That said, this was the first season since 2018 he was able to get strikeouts and avoid walks and home runs, granted there were injuries along the way (and not last year), so despite his obvious skills he's a risky choice. Especially because reliever wins are not predictive of more reliever wins the next year.

Followed his remarkable rookie season with a just as remarkable sophomore turn. His xERA was 3.09, much more indicative of the quality of his pitching. He's still pretty much a fastball/slider pitcher, but he used his change up more last year to good effect. An uptick in fly balls allowed and an uptick in the rate they left the yard is his only blemish, and probably addressable. I was concerned last year that he'd be bid too high but he was pretty much bid just right. He'll cost more this year but he's also more proven.

He's pretty much always worked as a starter/long reliever who has had limited innings, despite a variety of pitches that would seem capable of carrying him through a lineup the third time. But he's also been prone to giving up homers (2.02 per 9 last year), which has been a problem. His 2022 success can be attributed to his allowing only .80 per 9 that year. He can be useful for streaming when the situation is right and when he's healthy. He had two IL stints last year because of a bad back.

He opted out of the final $21M year with the Cubs, apparently looking for a multiyear deal despite missing seven starts each of the last two years. He hit the IL in early August with hip inflammation, then suffered a fractured rib during his rehab. The year before it was COVID and a bum shoulder that caused him to miss time. He's been a pretty consistent 3.65 ERA and 1.25 WHIP pitcher throughout his career, striking out 7.5 per 9, walking 2.6 per 9 (though he was worse than that last year), throwing lots of ground balls and not many homers. That's a recipe for moderate success when he can get out on the field. He signed with the Yankees for two years and $37 million, which locks in an additional $16M. I can go for that. As a fairly strong ground ball pitcher he should be hurt less by Yankee Stadium than other pitch to contact hurlers are.

He missed the first six weeks of the season with forearm inflammation and another 15 days later in the season with a sore hamstring. He's struggled in his third time through the order, and with the injuries, so there's no reason to hope for more than a little, but he did earn in 2021. He started that season in the pen and moved to the rotation midway through. He was brilliant in both roles because he pitched well but also because he was lucky leaving runners on base. It's better to expect more like the last two years, where he's a credible contributor living on the knife's edge of profit and loss.

After a solid rookie season he landed on the IL in his sophomore tilt, missing the first half of the year with elbow inflammation. After his return his fastball velocity remained the same, but his strikeout rate dropped from 11.5 to 7.8, the result of an increased use of change ups. There is talk that the Padres will use him this year as a closer, though they signed NPB's Yuki Matsui and KBO's Woo Suk Go. His value will be very much tied to how many strikeouts he throws, and it doesn't make sense to project a return to 2022's level.

A very effective setup guy the last two years, he's an excellent target in leagues that count holds, and quality innings with strikeouts in leagues that don't. But don't pay him as if he's going to earn $8 again, even if he might. There will be guys who are just as effective available on waivers most weeks. His real value added is the chance that he'll end up with saves if Jordan Romano were to get hurt.

What is a Thielbar? A safe as milk middle reliever, will throw some strikeouts, won't get in too much trouble and might win a game if you're lucky. Until last year he'd been pretty steady for the Twins. Last year he was steady when he played, but missed a bunch of time in the first half with an oblique strain.

A second-round draft pick in 2022, in his first pro season, mostly in High-A, he was spectacular. He's known for his control but he struck out 13.05 per 9 in 30.3 Double-A innings. Part of the haul the Padres received for Juan Soto he may not see the majors this year, but then again he may, and with his control and ground-ball tendencies he might hold a back of the rotation spot for them. He's got a good heater that sets up his killer change up nicely, but he struggled with his health and control last year. A successful AFL tour last fall may be a harbinger for his promotion to Triple-A early this season, and he's got the stuff to advance quickly if he can handle the command issues. A gamble this year or next, the upside potential of his swing and miss stuff is significant. BLUE JAYS

He won seven games for the Braves last year working in middle relief, a tribute to their productive offense. Four of those games were tied, two were down one run, and nine were down two runs. He was not having a great season when he was arrested in September on domestic violence charges. Matters like this can resolve in a variety of ways. Los Angeles prosecutors chose to not file felony charges against him, but he faces misdemeanor charges. A long-shot bet on him being innocent could pay off, we just don't know what the situation is beyond his arrest, but since this is his second violation of MLB's violence policy he almost certainly faces a long suspension unless he's innocent. Also, be aware that his big earnings in 2021 and 2022 were built on high win totals and super low qualitative stats. He's a good pitcher, not a great one, and appears to be a bad man.

When he was called up by the Brewers last year in July he'd thrown just 59.7 innings above rookie ball, partly because of injuries, but what's notable is that in those innings he'd struck out 97 batters. Uribe was throwing heat and I don't mean his fastball, which has been clocked at 103, but his slider was averaging nearly 100 mph. After he reached Milwaukee the slider was a much more approachable 89.4 mph, which was still Top-20 among major leaguers with 30 or more innings. The problem was and is that Uribe struggles to throw strikes, so lots of strikeouts, lots of walks, and no homers allowed. That was pretty effective last year and you have to figure that they're going to work with him to take a little off, let his stuff do some of the talking, so maybe he'll be more effective going forward. He's not a sure shot but could easily end up closing at any time.

He missed a big chunk of last summer with shoulder inflammation, and was better though no great shakes when he came back. He doesn't figure to be in the rotation to start the season unless there are injuries, and his lack of strikeout punch makes him a third-tier starter for fantasy in the best of times.

His xERA last year was 4.33, way higher than his ERA (3.45), FIP (3.50), xFIP (3.39), and SIERA (3.70). I think that means the defense picked him up, which Valdez always relies on because he's been a heavy thrower of ground balls. Last year, however, less so, as his line-drive allowed rate ticked up. His problems emerged in the second half (3.87 xFIP vs 3.00 in the first half), but at least part of that was a drop in the number of hitters left on base. There's no reason to panic, but also no reason for over enthusiasm.

Saw 4.7 innings in Arizona last year, and racked up a miserable 7.02 ERA in Triple-A, but that's the Pacific Coast League so it doesn't count for that much. He's a pure two-pitch reliever with an ace heater and an ace slider and I don't know, maybe really bad control. He's likely to see time in Seattle this year and unlikely to have any value unless that bad control becomes better.

Perhaps most importantly, he's the only major league pitcher ever whose first name is Louie. There have been five Louises, FWIW. And, FWIW, I played with a kid named Louie on my junior high school team. This Louie was up with the Twins a few times last year, working as a starter early on and returning in September in relief. The results were dramatically different, as he struggled as a starter (5.49 FIP) and thrived as a reliever (2.84) FIP. His strikeout rate jumped by four per 9 as a reliever and his already low 2.57 walk rate dropped to .75 when he relieved. That's not to say he should be converted just yet, but it's something to keep an eye on. He throws hard with good control, which is a good foundation upon which to build.

He hasn't shown the dominance or the control you'd like to see since he moved from High-A to Double-A in 2021, which isn't to say that he won't find a way to get the job as a starter done. But his 2.87 ERA in the majors last year (in 37.7 innings) came with a 4.98 FIP and a 5.27 xERA, and he struck out just 33 and walked 18. He'll surely get a shot at the rotation in San Diego but is far from an obvious success at this point.

Most of his numbers look pretty normal for Verlander, at least as they range over his long career, but last season he threw fewer swinging strikes than ever before and he was hit more often on balls in the zone than ever before. The results didn't help the Mets and they didn't improve after he went to the Astros, but they were just fine. Obviously the risk of collapse increases every year, and obviously he'll be babied, so don't expect much more than 150 innings, but as a wizened vet who can still throw 94 mph, he'll still get plenty of hitters out.

The oft-injured hurler turned down $32M over the next two years to stay with San Diego, after having his best season since 2017 (the last time he made 30 starts). I thought he should have taken the money because I found it hard to imagine another team offering him more, and the Royals didn't. They signed Wacha for $32M with an opt-out after one year, which is extra value if not more money. His 2023 season featured a low-ish BABIP, a high-ish LOB%, and his best HR/FB rate since 2015. That last has been a problem for him throughout his career but seems to be trending down as he adjusts his mix from more fastballs to more change ups. The temptation after two positive years will be to trust that he's got things under control. Maybe, but I'm not going too far on a guy whose limit seems to be about 125 innings.

What was extraordinary was that he didn't walk guys in 2022. His rise in walk rate last year was more a return to normal rather than a decline. He hasn't shown that he's going to be a pitcher to own, and pitching for a bad team like Oakland means he has to do better than others just to get to zero. But there is minor breakout potential here because he has three good pitches.

The 2023 first rounder, 24th overall, struggled with his control after being promoted to Double-A and Triple-A last year. That's been an ongoing problem for him, but his splitter and slider are tough and the Braves seem ready to push him aggressively. That's worked for some of their young arms and not for others. Probably not worth a draft day bid, but get on him if he's promoted. BRAVES

The volume of strikeouts as he set a career-high in innings pitched and a career-low WHIP, thanks to a 3.6 percent walk rate, led to career-best fantasy earnings last year. He's very good at inducing ground balls and avoiding hard contact, which helps him even though he doesn't put up elite strikeout numbers. Last year was his worst for Hard Hit%. What he's been doing is hard and as a fantasy owner I wouldn't get too comfortable expecting him to repeat year after year, but he's skilled enough and been successful long enough that he's going to cost you.

More punchouts last year than the year before would be a promising trend, but the fact is he throws a lot of fly balls and a lot of those leave the yard, so his numbers were helped by a nearly 83 percent LOB% (xERA was 4.04, while his FIP/xFIP were 4.98 and 4.63). His solid control helps him and he could be a useful streaming option in big ballparks and against teams lacking in power, but in spite of last year's solid results he's a tough sell in mixed leagues.

He started the season in the Cubs rotation, which seemed a payoff for those who saw his 2022 cup of coffee success as a sign of things to come. Alas, they did not go so well and by June he was working out of the pen, where he was more effective. With a Cubs rotation that seems pretty full this year, it's going to take injuries or a super-hot spring for Wesneski to find another rotation spot. Working in relief is unlikely to give him any fantasy value.

Remarkable consistency and control since he landed in Philadelphia in 2020. At some point that's going to end but the only reason to think it this year is that including the postseason he went 219.7 innings last year.

Reached Double-A by the end of last season, throwing elite strikeouts off the mix of his 94 mph heater and devastating change-up. In 19.7 innings he walked 11, which is not the way to get ahead, but control had not been a problem at lower levels. Potential starter if he can keep the pieces together at some point this season,, though more likely for 2025. GIANTS

He returned from hip surgery last year but then spent a lot of time on the IL with elbow problems. When he pitched he sometimes started and sometimes relieved. It looks like he's headed to the pen this year, where he's been much better in his short career than as a starter. For instance, 2.65 ERA as a reliever, and a 4.76 ERA as a starter. Not worth a speculative play this year, but keep an eye out in case he's given a role with more leverage.

He got pounded in his last start, which wrecked his ERA in the majors last year. Without it he was 4-1 with a 3.00 ERA (4.17 xFIP). His strikeout rate, however, cratered after he joined the Cubs, with particularly odious results from his cutter and slider. These numbers for seven starts are very small, so better to focus on the success of his sinking fastball and change up. Those are the foundation that will support the success of a better mix this year. Plenty of potential, but he's going to have find more swing and miss to reach it.

The heater didn't get the swing-and-a-miss results it did in the minors, but paired with his slider did a pretty good job. His estimated ERAs range from 4.05 to 4.53, so some regression is likely, but he's young and surely still learning how to handle big-league hitters at this point. A big factor will be whether he can upgrade his change up, which was very ineffective last year. Consider him a work in progress with a chance to quickly bust, but also a chance to drink the Guardians-system Kool-Aid and break out.

Known for a dominating splitter, he made it to the bigs last summer and did just fine working as a starter and in long relief. What role he ends up with this year and going forward likely depends on the further development of his slider, which he threw just four percent of the time last year. Figure him a fifth starter to start the season with some chance of success.

He threw his fastball 73 percent of the time, two-thirds four seamers and one-third sinkers, which was understandable because his other stuff was hit. He's only had 44 innings at Double-A and none in Triple-A, so he's surely going through some serious adjustments adapting to big-league hitters. He's likely to be treated gently, meaning that if he struggles at all he won't likely stay with the big club. Those fastballs of his were so good, he may just make it work.

Early season hamstring and back injuries didn't help him, but he also wasn't the limited but clever starter last year he was the two preceding years. And 2022, when he didn't pitch badly, was not a roto success because of bad luck. Where he lands, what they want him to do, and how physically able he is to do the job will all be factors for him this year. For fantasy players, in an only league he'll be worth a $1 bid if that's the league he signs in. He's that skilled, but he's clearly not the pitcher he once was physically.

He was traded to the Royals in November, but won't be a factor this year because he's recovering from surgery to repair his shoulder. Following his solid 2022 season, roto teams with keepers might be interested for 2025.

The safe thing is to take the moderate position. Yamamoto will be good, maybe very good, but there will likely be a period of transition. And there might be, but looking at video of him during the World Baseball Classic and reading Eno Sarris's comparison of Yamamoto's pitch tracking data, describing the speed and shape of his pitches in Japan compared to the data on major leaguers, leads him to say: "We can say with a tiny bit more certainty that he's like a Gausman with Bassitt's curve and Eflin's command, which would be a dominant combination but also has not necessarily existed in one human being before." Of course, Eno also says, "Nobody knows what they'll get for sure," but concludes that Yamamoto looks like an ace, but a short one and so somewhat more likely to break down than a bigger pitcher. That sounds right to me, so in a year he's healthy he may turn out to be a bargain no matter what the fantasy cost. Or close. With the potential for disaster if he ends up busting or getting hurt. The bidding should be fun!

After one of the great fantasy closer seasons in 2019, but injuries plagued him until last year, when he again pitched regularly. Unfortunately, the precision control he showed in his career year has disappeared and he struggled to keep the ball in the park. He still has an excellent splitter as an out pitch, but until he regains his control he's unlikely to be trusted with more than a setup role with occasional chances for saves.

Hitterr projections for Rookie Hitters are far from perfect, but they usually do a decent job of describing the player's style of play. Is he a power hitter,, a contact hitter, wicked fast? The projection usually shows that.

Projections for Rookie Pitchers are more problematic. All of these guys below can throw the heck out of the ball, but even if they showed good command and control in the minors, the major league environment is a much different thing.

Finally, I left the Asian players out of these lists. They have much different histories, and while they're eligible to win the awards, they should be looked at as majoir league talent.

POSITION
RANKINGS 2024

These are the rankings based on the Big Prices in the Guide, which was finalized on January 22, 2024.

Players are listed at all positions at which they played 15 or more major league games in 2023. Players who didn't play 15 at any one position are listed at the position they played most. Minor leaguers are listed at the position they're expected to play most.

Please check your league's eligibility rules to make sure players are in their right place.

The dollar values for the Top 216 pitchers and Top 336 hitters add up to $6120, roughly, but you should make your own choices at the bottom of the ranks.

These are the rankings based on the Big Prices in the Guide, which was finalized on January 22, 2024.

Pitcher roles are usually clear cut, but there are always ambiguous pitchers. This year the Marlins say that AJ Puk is going to start. I don't believe them and have him listed as a reliever. In San Francisco, the Giants say Jordan Hicks will be a starter. That has a better chance of happening but I'm still skeptical. He's listed as a reliever, top.

Meanwhile, there isn't a spot for Tanner Houck in the Red Sox rotation, but I suspect he'll end up starting more than reliever. He's listed as a starter. Caveat emptor.

MULTI-POSITION ELIGIBILITY

These are the major league hitters with bid prices in the Guide who had 15 games played or more at two or more positions.

The numbers in each column are the number of games they played at that position.

DH does not count as a position, but is listed here for informational purposes.

I was unable to get detailed Minor League Games Played by Position data, so there is no minor league chart. Baseball-reference.com is the best source of minor league games played on the individual player cards. Figuring out how your league gives position eligibility with little or no playing time can give you a big leg up on auction/draft day.
